CHAPTER VIII.

THE REFORMED CARBONARI.

TWO results of great importance in the progress of the European revolution proceeded from the events that occurred at Naples in 1820–21. One was the reorganisation of the Carbonari, consequent upon the publicity given to the system when it had brought about the revolution, and the secrecy in which it had hitherto been enveloped was no longer deemed necessary; the other was the extension of the system beyond the Alps. When the Neapolitan revolution had been effected, the Carbonari emerged from their mystery, published their constitution and statutes, and ceased to conceal their patents and their cards of membership. In the Papal States, in Lombardy, and in Piedmont, the veil of secrecy was maintained for a little time longer, partly through the adoption by the Carbonari of those portions of the peninsula of symbols and pass-words different from those of the Neapolitan lodges, partly by the formation of the various societies of the Adelphi, the Guelphs, the Brother Protectors, and the Italian Federati, which were similar, and yet not the same, though all holding the same principles, and having a common object. But after the collapse of the Piedmontese revolution, so much doubt and fear existed among the leaders as to the extent to which the secrets of the system were known that they were all effaced, and consigned to oblivion. The scattered directors of the movement drew together the broken threads of the conspiracy as soon as they were able, but with a new nomenclature and a new symbolism.

The dispersion of the Carbonaro leaders had, at the same time, the effect of extending the system in France, where it had been introduced towards the end of 1820, and creating centres of revolutionary agitation in the foreign cities in which they temporarily located themselves. General Pepe proceeded to Barcelona when the counter-revolution was imminent at Naples, and his life was no longer safe there; and to the same city went several of the Piedmontese revolutionists when their country was Austrianized after the same lawless fashion. Scalvini and Ugoni took refuge at Geneva; others of the proscribed proceeded to London. This dispersion, and the progress which Carbonarism was making in France, suggested to General Pepe the idea of an international secret society, which should combine for a common purpose the advanced political reformers of all the European States.

Shortly after his arrival at Madrid, to which city he proceeded from Barcelona, he propounded to two or three ultra-Liberal deputies the plan of this society, the object of which, he says, "was to enable the members to correspond, and by these means preclude the possibility of a renewal of that want of union which had been experienced amongst the most noted patriots of Spain and Portugal, Naples and Piedmont. Several deputies of the Cortes were inclined to regard such an association as extremely beneficial to the public cause, more especially in their own peninsula, where a great want of concord existed between the Portuguese and the Spaniards. The society was accordingly founded; several members of the Cortes formed part of it, as well as General Ballesteros, Councillor of State. I still preserve the regulations of this society, the great object of which was to open a communication between the most enlightened patriots of the different cities in Europe. It was decided that I should exert myself to give it extension in Lisbon, London, and Paris; and that, in the event of my success, other members should proceed to propagate it over Italy and Germany."*

Having organised in Madrid the first circle of the Constitutional Society of European Patriots, Pepe proceeded to Lisbon, where he was even more successful in his efforts than in the Spanish capital. Two of the Ministers, and several Councillors of State and members of the Cortes signified their adhesion, and before Pepe left a flourishing circle was formed, under the direction of Almeida-Moraes, the president of the Cortes. From Lisbon the general proceeded by sea to London, where, as he says, he soon found that "a secret society in England among men of mind is a thing quite out of the order of probability." He mentioned the society to a few, but met with no encouragement. The Duke of Sussex and Sir Robert Wilson read the statutes and regulations of the society, but only as a matter of curiosity. Lord Holland put them aside, with the remark, "I am not fond of secret things; I am apt, at the House of Lords, to tell all I know."

Pepe next opened a correspondence with Lafayette, who hailed the proposed international organisation of the secret societies as "a Holy Alliance opposed to that of despotism,"* and at once associated himself with it. He, with Manuel and Argenson, the triumvirate that was supposed to have directed the Associated Patriots of 1816, were earnestly engaged at that time in the reorganisation of the Carbonari of France upon a new system, which promised more perfect impenetrability; and Buonarotti was similarly engaged at Geneva, with a view to renewed operations in Italy. Under the new organisation, the movement was directed in each country by a central junta, the members of which were unknown to all but a few. The secondary juntas had no correspondence with each other, nor any cognisance of their respective meetings or composition. All the affairs of the association were under the supreme control of the central junta, whose power, radiating through the several circles, was implicitly obeyed by all the initiated. Members were enrolled with the utmost care, and only after minute inquiries concerning their character and antecedents, so as to avoid, if possible, the admission of spies, or persons who might be readily seduced into treachery. The meetings were held at night, in lonely houses and other places where they were not likely to attract attention. All orders, resolutions, &c., were transmitted verbally, and in public the members communicated, when necessary, by signs.

In the formation of new lodges, two members of the Grand Lodge initiated the first member, and made him its president, without acquainting him with their rank in the society; and at the same time constituted themselves respectively its vice-president and censor. As the vice-president alone was in communication with the Grand Lodge, and the censor controlled the proceedings in the provincial and local lodges, the Grand Lodge was thus enabled to keep all the secrets of the society within itself. The number of members forming a lodge was limited to twenty, in order to lessen the chances of danger from treachery; and as communication between the lodges, or members of different lodges, was forbidden, any discovery that might be made by the police could proceed no further than the lodge in which it was made. As a further means of baffling the police, a double organisation was introduced, the society being divided for military purposes into legions, cohorts, centuries, and manipules.

The French police never could discover whether the system was introduced from Piedmont or from Spain; but they were convinced that its disseminators proceeded from one or other of those countries. They were wrong in both conjectures, however, the truth being that it was introduced by two young men, Dugied and Joubert, who had been initiated at Naples.* These, on their return to Paris, initiated five others—namely, Bazard, Buchez, Flotard, Carriol, and Limperani. A copy of the statutes of Carbonarism had been brought from Naples by Dugied, who, with Limperani, translated them into French, with the view of founding the system in France. The religious tone that pervaded Carbonarism among the Italians did not harmonise, however, with the ideas so widely prevalent among the educated men of France, and the statutes were referred for modification to Bazard, Buchez, and Flotard, who, as well as Dugied and Joubert, were Freemasons. All Catholic allusions having been removed, the code was adopted, and the Grand Lodge of France was formed by the adhesion of the seven individuals whose names have been given.

The system spread so rapidly that the founders began to distrust their ability to direct it, and consulted as to the course to be pursued in order to procure the adhesion, as directors of the movement, of one or two of the Liberal leaders. Bazard suggested an application to Lafayette, with whom he was acquainted; and, with the approbation of the Grand Lodge, the office of Grand Master of the society was offered to that veteran revolutionist, who had been one of the pioneers of liberty in both hemispheres. Lafayette accepted it, and the adhesion of Manuel, Argenson, Corcelles, and other leading Liberals followed. It was then resolved to extend the system to the provinces, and with that view Dugied undertook a mission of propagandism to Dijon and Maçon, Joubert visited Strasburg and Colmar, Flotard went to Tours, Saumur, and Rochelle, and an associate named Rouen took Nantes for his centre of operations.

It has been doubted whether Lafayette, Manuel, and Argenson, with others who were supposed to be the leaders of the Carbonari in France, were actually the chiefs of the society; and, with regard to Manuel at least, the point is not susceptible of positive demonstration. There are, in all countries, men of superior station who, when a collision between the people and the Government is impending, are aware of what is going on, and hold themselves prepared to step to the front when the movement has advanced to a point at which they can do so with advantage to the cause and safety to themselves; but who take care not to commit themselves to it prematurely, or to allow any trace to exist of their connexion with it. This has been thought by some to have been the real position of the individuals whom others have asserted to have been the actual leaders of the Carbonari, as they had previously been held to be of the Associated Patriots; but though there is no absolute proof that they were the Grand Elect there can be very little, if any, moral doubt upon the point.

The initiations in France were most numerous among the students of the universities and public schools, subaltern and non-commissioned officers of the army, and superior artisans. Every member was required to provide himself with a musket and bayonet, and twenty rounds of ball cartridge. No popular assemblage took place in 1821 without a considerable number of the Carbonari being present, in order to be ready to take advantage of any opportunity that might occur of creating a tumult favourable to the attainment of their object. When the King opened the Chambers or reviewed the troops in the gardens of the Tuileries, the Carbonari were on the alert; for the seizure of the royal family formed a part of their plan, as it had done of that of the Associated Patriots.

In the first ardour of their association, and before they were sufficiently organised for such an enterprise, a plan was arranged for surprising Vincennes, corrupting the garrison of Paris, inciting the masses of the capital to insurrection, and attacking the Tuileries. Nantil and Capès, captains in one of the regiments forming the garrison of Paris, were to lead out their companies and direct the revolt in the capital; and the leaders of the movement were to raise the provinces in the event of the rising being successful in Paris. Lafayette retired to his country residence to prepare his department to second the movement at Vincennes; Argenson went to his ironworks at Mulhouse, where he employed a large number of workmen, among whom his benevolence, no less than his political sentiments, rendered him extremely popular; Corcelles, the friend and relative of Lafayette, and a man of fiery temperament and indomitable will, proceeded to Lyons; and St. Aignan, another of the conspirators, to Nantes. When all was prepared, an accidental explosion at Vincennes caused the police, civil and military, to be on the alert, and the outbreak was deferred. Nantil had attracted to himself the suspicious of the police, and he fled; his regiment was removed from Paris, and the scheme of the conspirators was for the time laid aside.

In 1821, the chiefs of the movement being Lafayette, Manuel, and Argenson, the Grand Lodge of Paris numbered among its members Dupont, Corcelles, Mérilhou, Constant, Rey, Bazard, Buchez, Kœchlin, Schonen, and Arnold Scheffer; and the initiated elsewhere comprised Generals Carbineau, Pajol, Tarayre, Bachelu, Merlin, Maronsin, and Lafitte, and Colonels Fabvier, Caron, Ordener, Deutzel, and Brice. Towards the end of the year the plan of an insurrection was matured, and in order to distract the Government, and induce the belief that the ramifications of the plot were more extensive than they really were, it was determined to raise the flag of revolt simultaneously at several places, some of which, were hundreds of miles apart. These points were Neu Brisach, BÉfort, Colmar, Mulhouse, Toulon, Marseilles, Rochelle, Thouars, Saumur, and Nantes. The night of the 29th of December was fixed for the enterprise, which was to commence in the garrisons of Alsace. A proclamation was drawn up by Bazard, subsequently a chief of the St. Simonians, announcing the establishment of a republic and the formation of a provisional government, consisting of Lafayette, Manuel, Argenson, Constant, and Lafitte.

The movement was to commence at Neu Brisach and BÉfort, whence the military Carbonari were to march upon Colmar, where Colonel Caron was to join them with as many men of his regiment of dragoons as he could induce to follow him. From Colmar the insurgents were to advance upon Strasburg and Nancy, intercept the communications with Paris, proclaim the provisional government, and await the results of the movement in the south and the west. On the eve of the great festival of the Christian year Lafayette left Paris for his country house, and Argen-son and Kœchlin for their works at Mulhouse and Colmar. It was arranged that Lafayette should proceed to BÉfort at the last moment, but he failed to present himself, representing as his excuse to the emissaries sent to him from the lodges of Neu Brisach, BÉfort, Colmar, and Mulhouse, that he was solemnising the anniversary of the death of his wife, an event of which the excuse requires us to suppose that he was oblivious until after measures had been concerted for the insurrection. This delay produced irresolution in some quarters, and counter-orders and mistakes in others, the rising having to be deferred, in consequence, to the night of the 1st of January, 1822.

On that day BÉfort was filled with the Carbonari, whose numbers escaped attention from the ever-watchful police, owing to the festive customs with which, among the French, the new year is ushered in. Lafayette was known to be on his way, accompanied by his son, and many members of the Paris lodges had arrived, including Corcelles and Bazard, Armand Carrel, afterwards so famous as a journalist, then a lieutenant of the regiment garrisoning Neu Brisach; and Colonel Pailhés, of the disbanded Imperial Guard. At night the conspirators put on their uniforms, armed themselves with swords and pistols, wrapped themselves in their cloaks, and eagerly awaited the signal of revolt. Adjutant Tellier assembled the sergeants of the garrison in his room, and directed them, as if by order of the colonel, to have their men ready in their rooms, in heavy marching order, and prepared to turn out at the first tap of the drum. By the initiated this was understood, but the sergeants were not all of the number, and two of them went to the captain of their company, and asked the meaning of the order. The captain, knowing no more of the matter than themselves, could only tell them that he supposed the colonel had a good reason for the order; but he felt uneasy about it, and when the sergeants had left him, he went to the colonel, who, knowing that he had given no such order, acquainted the commandant, Toustain, with the circumstance. Toustain divined a plot, and instantly took measures to counteract it.

In the meantime the two sergeants had returned to their barracks, and one of them had told Tellier that the captain knew nothing about the order that had been given: Tellier saw immediately that the plot would be suspected, and hastened to warn the officers who were engaged in it. They immediately took off their uniforms, and hurried to the principal gate of the town, the military guard at which was commanded that night by Lieutenant Manoury, who was one of the initiated. The first arrivals had scarcely passed through the gate when Toustain came up with a detachment, arrested a group of officers who were conversing with Manoury, and, consigning them to the guard-room, traversed the outer works, and overtook the fugitives, who had kept on the high road, in order to intercept and warn Lafayette. He called to them to surrender, and advanced towards them, when he was shot by Lieutenant Peugnot, who, with his companions, immediately took to flight.

The soldiers raised Toustain, who at first seemed dead ; but the Cross of the Legion of Honour which he wore on his breast had prevented the ball from penetrating, and he was able to return to the gate. Manoury was then found to have fled from his post, accompanied by the prisoners ; and the commandant could then only turn out the troops, and take precautions against a tumult or a surprise. The police were immediately on the alert, but all the conspirators had fled ; and some papers which were seized at an inn in the town, and which it was supposed would throw some light on the conspiracy, were recovered by a bribe, and burned. Corcelles and Bazard had fled towards Paris, and at the distance of a few leagues from B efort met the carriage in which Lafayette and his son were travelling in the opposite direction, confident of the success of a movement which had been so well planned. The carriage was immediately turned from the highway, and driven to Gray, where Lafayette and his son remained for some days, at the house of an old friend, the ex-deputy Martin, as if they had gone there on a visit.

Corcelles and Bazard went on to Paris, and no clue was found that could connect either them or Lafayette with the conspiracy. Carrel got safely out of B efort, and rejoined his regiment at Neu Brisach. Pailh es escaped to Colmar, where he and Buchez were arrested on suspicion. Tellier and a sergeant named Watebled were traced to a publichouse near B ale, where the sergeant committed suicide by shooting himself with a pistol on the entrance of the gendarmes, and Tellier was arrested.

A few days after the abortive movement at B efort, Colonel Caron, who had conceived the idea of delivering Pailh es and Buchez from prison, and initiating a movement of which he should be the hero, led his regiment from one village to another, endeavouring to raise the peasantry in the name of Napoleon II., which he thought would be for them a more potent spell than that of the Republic. Unfortunately for himself, his visits to Pailh es and Buchez in prison had caused him to be suspected; and a lieutenant of his regiment, who had been sounded by him, was induced by the police to seem to concur in his design, and concert with them his arrest when he had irretrievably committed himself. When, therefore, Caron had pronounced his charm in vain, he was surrendered by his soldiers, tried by court-martial, and shot in the fosse of the citadel. General Foy protested warmly in the Chamber of Deputies against the manner in which Caron had been led on to his death by the detestable intrigues of the police.

The failure at B efort prevented any movement being made in other places, and no traces of the conspiracy were discovered by the police. No connexion could be found between the conspirators of B efort and suspected persons elsewhere, and the Government had to be content with the prosecution of Pailh es, Buchez, Tellier, and a few others, who, being convicted on very slight evidence, were condemned to three years' imprisonment.

The execution of the conspirators' plan had only been deferred, and towards the end of February the revolt broke out almost simultaneously at Thouars, Rochelle, Marseilles, and Toulon. General Berton, who had served with distinction in the Spanish campaigns, left Parthenay on the night of the 23rd, at the head of a body of retired officers and soldiers, and surprised Thouars, where he openly hoisted the tri-coloured flag, and issued a proclamation announcing the fall of the monarchy and the formation of a provisional Government, in which, on this occasion, the name of General Foy was substituted for that of Lafitte. Early on the following morning he marched on Saumur, where his design was frustrated by the energy of the mayor. He fell back, therefore, upon Thouars, whence, on finding his little force falling away from him, he fled towards Rochefort, where he concealed himself in the marshes.

Bories, a sub-officer of the army, had in the meantime set out from Pau, with several privates of his regiment, and arrived at Rochelle, to take part in the movement there. He was betrayed, however, by one of his accomplices, while concerting with General Berton a combined movement on Saumur, and arrested, with three sergeants of the garrison of Rochelle, named Raoux, Goubin, and Pommier, upon whom were found cards of affiliation and daggers marked with their respective numbers on the register of the Carbonaro lodge of which they were members. The movements at Marseilles and Toulon were as abortive as those of Thouars and Rochelle; but the news of these movements threw the workmen of Lyons into a revolutionary ferment, and caused a tumult which continued for several days, and was not suppressed without much bloodshed, but which does not appear to have had any connexion with the Carbonari. At Marseilles and Toulon, however, distinct traces of the conspiracy were discovered, and at the former place Captain Vallée was arrested on the charge of participation in it.

From the statements of Bories and the Rochelle sergeants, and the information given by the man who had betrayed them, the police obtained a clue to the conspiracy, and had their former suspicions concerning its leaders confirmed. The Royalists clamoured loudly for the arrest of Lafayette, Manuel, and Argenson, and Pepe says that he "was in constant expectation of hearing that Lafayette had been arrested, for he had been fully aware of the proceedings of Berton, whom he had assisted with his advice and with money." The Villele Ministry shrank from that step, partly because there was not sufficient evidence of the participation of the suspected deputies in the conspiracy, and partly because they foresaw the probability of worse consequences from making political martyrs of them than from leaving them at large. The affair assumed so much importance, however, from the evidence which had been obtained of a wide-spread conspiracy, that Bories and the Rochelle sergeants were removed for trial to Paris. Colonel Caron and Captain Vallée were tried by court-martial, convicted, and shot, and General Berton and five others were condemned to the guillotine, but, on the intercession of the Duchess of Angoulême, four of them were spared the infliction of the capital sentence. Caffé, a physician, committed suicide in prison, and only Berton therefore went to the scaffold, behaving there with courage and fortitude, his last words being, "Vive la France! Vive la Liberté!"

The trial of Bories and his companions occupied several days, and excited the most profound interest. The Court was crowded every day, and the proceedings created a visible agitation among all classes; while Lafayette, Manuel, Argenson, and Constant made the hall of the Chamber of Deputies ring with their denunciations of the Government, against whom they boldly declared all measures to be justifiable. The intrepid bearing of the accused enhanced the interest inspired by their position. Bories assumed the entire responsibility of the movement at Rochelle, but the Villele Ministry, considering it necessary to act with rigour, and being irritated by the constant attacks of the Liberal deputies, had determined upon the death of all the accused. After their conviction, an attempt was made to procure their escape by bribing a gaoler; but the man, while pretending to be corrupt, gave information to the authorities, and, on the money being taken to the prison, the bearer was arrested by the police while counting it. It was then resolved in the Carbonaro lodges to rescue the condemned men while on their way to the place of execution, by surrounding the carts in which the condemned are taken to the Place de Grève, cutting the cords by which their arms are bound, forcing a way through the troops, and conveying the prisoners to a place of safety, where they could be concealed until they could be conveyed out of Paris in disguise. This bold enterprise was to be directed by Colonel Fabvier, an officer of determined courage, who had served on the staff of Marshal Marmont; but, though thousands of men were ready to carry it out, they were overawed by the formidable display of military force which the Government deemed necessary, and the rescue of the prisoners was not attempted. The condemned men submitted to their fate with calmness and intrepidity, and their fate caused their memory to be long cherished by the revolutionists of France.

This conspiracy created much uneasiness in the minds of Louis and his Ministers; and, as the Carbonaro lodges were found to be most numerous in the departments of the west and the south, it was supposed that the system had been introduced from Spain. This idea constituted an additional motive for the intervention in that country which was proposed to the Holy Alliance shortly afterwards. An outbreak of yellow fever at Barcelona was made the pretext for establishing, at the base of the Pyrenees, a strong sanitary cordon, which was swelled by degrees to a military cordon, so that, by the time the Congress of Verona assembled, a large body of troops was massed around Toulouse. It was there arranged that France should play in Spain the part which Austria had played in Italy in the preceding year; and, in the event of possible danger to the Bourbon dynasty in France from any reverse, the armies of Austria and Russia were to cross the Rhine, and restore order in that country while the Duke of Angoulême effected a counter-revolution in Spain.

The time had now come for bringing into operation the international organisation of the secret societies which had been devised by General Pepe. Zea, an agent of the revolutionary party in Colombia, was at this time in London, where he had succeeded in procuring a loan of two millions for the purposes of his party ; and he was in communication with Pepe, who, as we have seen, had opened a correspondence with Lafayette. The hopes of the Italian Carbonari had been for some time centred in Spain ; and the fear of French intervention in that country which had been excited by the concentration of troops at Toulouse made them anxious for the preservation of the Spanish Constitution, and desirous, in the same degree, of a revolution in France. The French Carbonari, on their part, thought that a revolt among the troops at Toulouse would bring about the fall of Louis XVIII., and save the Constitution both in Spain and Portugal. Some correspondence on this subject between Pepe and Lafayette resulted in the authorisation of the latter by Zea to conclude a secret treaty with the Spanish Government, by which the independence of Colombia and Mexico was to be acknowledged, and those republics were to furnish a body of troops and a loan of four millions, in the event of war between Spain and France. One half of this sum was already in Zea's hands, and the capitalists who had furnished it had promised to provide the other moiety as soon as Spain should have acknowledged the independence of Colombia and Mexico.

These preliminaries having been arranged, Pepe sent Colonel Pisa to Toulouse with a sum of two thousand pounds, obtained from Zea, to be applied by a General whom he does not name, but who, I have reason to believe, was General Lafitte, to the purposes of the conspiracy. Pisa ventured to proceed from Toulouse to Paris, where he seems to have been recognised by the Duchess of Berri, who had seen him at Naples ; and the famous detective, Vidocq, was immediately instructed to look for him. General Cobrianchi, who had also been on Pepe's staff in the Abruzzi, and was now residing in Paris, concealed Pisa in his house, however, until an opportunity could be found for him to leave France undetected. He conveyed to Pepe a letter from Lafayette, to be laid before the leaders of the Liberal party in Spain, urging them to demand the recognition of the independence of Colombia and Mexico, and setting forth the advantages which would accrue to the cause of Constitutional Government everywhere, and especially in the Iberian Peninsula.

Armed with this letter, Pepe went to Madrid, viâ Lisbon, and convened a meeting of the leading members of the Cortes at the house of Riego, the hero of 1812. Ballesteros, Isturitz, Galiani, and about a dozen others attended, and to them Pepe read Lafayette's letter, and expounded his views. The deputies listened attentively, but the proposition fell dead ; the Constitutional cause needed money, and might need the support of a French revolution, but Galiani assured Pepe that the recognition of the independence of the revolted Spanish vice-royalties would be too unpopular a measure to be thought of for a moment. This decision, which was concurred in by the other deputies present, was a great disappointment to all the parties to the scheme. It left the destinies of the Spanish American provinces to the arbitrament of the sword, diminished the chances of the preservation of the Spanish Constitution, and prevented any more of the money raised by Zea being applied to the purposes of the Carbonari.

The Franco-Spanish war was opposed by the leaders of that Society in the Chamber of Deputies with the utmost energy, and more violent and exciting scenes have never been witnessed in that Assembly than were enacted during the month of February, and especially during the early days of March, 1823. These disorders reached their culminating point on the 1st of March, when Manuel, the boldest and most eloquent member of his party, delivered an outburst of impassioned oratory which excited his opponents to fury, and was repeatedly interrupted by their expressions of dissent and indignation.

"If," he said in conclusion, "you would not endanger the life of King Ferdinand, beware of reproducing events which carried to the scaffold those who excite in you so keen an interest. It was because foreigners interfered in our own Revolution that Louis XVI. was crushed to the dust. It was when the misfortunes of the Royal family attracted the sympathy of foreigners that revolutionary France, feeling that it must defend itself by new forces——"

He was listened to no longer. The Royalists sprang to their feet howling with rage, and menaced him with their clenched hands. For several minutes nothing was heard but the confused din of a hundred mingled voices yelling, "Order!" "Turn him out!" "To the door with him!" The stentorian voice of Hyde de Neuville at length made itself heard above the uproar.

"This outrage must be avenged!" he exclaimed. "The horror of the allusion is too clear."

"It is a provocation of death to Ferdinand!" exclaimed another deputy.

Manuel attempted to complete his sentence, but his voice was drowned in the roar of shouts of execration proceeding from a hundred voices. The President of the Chamber put on his hat, but even that significant act had no effect in abating the storm. The calm attitude of Manuel, who remained standing in the tribune, seemed to increase the fury of his opponents, who yelled and gesticulated until hoarseness and exhaustion produced a lull. Then a committee was nominated to report upon the conduct of the obnoxious deputy, and the Chamber adjourned.

On the following day the committee presented their report, recommending the expulsion of Manuel from the Chamber for his language; and a motion to that effect was immediately made. He was allowed to speak in his defence; but he said nothing that was calculated, in the slightest degree, to mitigate the rage of his opponents. He maintained that, having been sent to that Assembly by the people, he could not be rightfully excluded from it; and this view was taken also by Royer-Collard, Girardin, and other members of the Opposition. The motion for his expulsion was carried, however, by an overwhelming majority.

On the memorable 4th Manuel entered the hall, and took his accustomed place on the extreme left. Murmurs immediately arose from the right and the centre, and Ravez, the President, requested him to retire. The refractory deputy protested that he would not abandon his place, unless compelled by violence. Ravez desired the ushers to remove him; but the Liberal deputies gathered round him, and prevented them from approaching. Some of the Royalists seemed eager to rush to the support of the ushers, but the scandal of a fight was avoided by the order of Ravez for a file of the National Guards on duty to be called. Several of that force entered, with an officer named Mercier at their head; but the Liberal deputies stood firm around Manuel, and Lafayette exhorted the National Guards not to dishonour themselves by dragging a representative of the people from the floor of the Assembly. They hesitated, and Mercier, on being again called upon by the President to do his duty, turned about and marched his file out of the hall, amidst the cheers of the Liberal deputies, which were loudly echoed by the crowd which had gathered outside.

Then, while the majority yelled, stamped, and gesticulated in the most outrageous manner, Ravez sent for a detachment of gendarmes. The appearance of these men evoked a cry of deprecation from the left, and Manuel again declared that he would yield only to force. Four gendarmes then, in obedience to the officer commanding the detachment, ascended to the bench on which Manuel was standing, seized him by the arms, and dragged him to the floor. He was then marched out of the hall in the midst of the detachment, followed by all the Liberal members. An immense throng received him with approving acclamations, and escorted him to his house in a manner which gave his expulsion the appearance of a popular triumph.

A month after this extraordinary scene was enacted, the French army, nominally commanded by the Duke of Angoulême, but directed in reality by Marshal Victor, crossed the Spanish frontier, where the Carbonari made their last effort to avert the extinction of liberty in Spain. About four hundred Carbonari refugees from France and Italy, under the command of Colonel Fabvier, posted themselves on the Bidassoa, wearing the uniform of the army of the French Empire, and displaying the tricoloured flag, in the hope that the invaders would not fire on a symbol consecrated by so many glorious scenes. But General Valin, who commanded the vanguard of the invading army, sent a flying battery against them, and at the second volley they dispersed into the mountains. Constitutional Government met the same fate in Spain as in Italy, and the victory of the Holy Alliance was complete.

Had the efforts of the Carbonari been attended with success in France, the struggle for liberty would have been renewed in Italy, to which country Pepe had an ultimate eye while endeavouring to support the constitutional cause in Spain. Buonarotti was in communication during 1822 with the chiefs of the Carbonari in France, and several visits to that country were made in the early part of the year by Alexandre Andryane, whose subsequent mission to Milan resulted so unfortunately for himself. The Carbonari of Italy had great hopes from the diplomacy of Pepe, and the failure of the abortive insurrection in France did not suffice to crush them. The French intervention in Spain might prove a disaster for the Government of Louis XVIII., and the establishment of a republic in France, with Lafayette at the head of affairs, following the victory of constitutionalism in Spain, would be a guarantee that the Austrians would not again be allowed to intervene in Italy as they had done in 1821. So reasoned Buonarotti and his friends ; but they were not in the secrets of the Holy Alliance.

Towards the end of 1822, Andryane again left Geneva and proceeded to Milan, in order to rekindle the courage of the Carbonari, and prepare them for a renewal of the struggle. He was furnished by Buonarotti with letters of introduction, instructions, ciphers, &c., but, fearful of danger in passing the frontier, he left those papers at Bellinzona, in the care of a Carbonaro refugee, who undertook to forward them safely. From the information he received on his way, and on his arrival at Milan, Andryane was convinced that nothing could then be attempted with any prospect of success. Count Confalioni and many more of the most distinguished men of Lombardy had been arrested, and the Imperial Commission appointed to try political offenders was spreading terror and dismay through the country.

Andryane wrote to Bellinzona without delay, to prevent his papers being forwarded; but it was too late. The packet arrived as he was preparing for a tour of pleasure through Italy, and the Austrian police almost immediately seized it in his room. He was thereupon arrested, and conveyed to the prison of Santa Margherita, where he was shortly afterwards interrogated by the Chief Commissioner, Salvotti. Andryane bequeathed to posterity a fearful picture of the sufferings endured by the imprisoned Carbonari,* which might be thought exaggerated if it was not corroborated by the narratives of Pellico and Maroncelli. They were lodged in dark cells, deprived of books and writing materials, enfeebled by bad and insufficient food, and harassed by daily examinations, in which Salvotti, setting at nought every principle of justice, acted at once as prosecuting counsel and judge, and employed every means of persuasion and intimidation to extort disclosures with a view to the crimination of others. These examinations, despotically conducted, and repeated every day during several months, at all hours of the day or night, as the Commissioner thought proper, constituted the whole of the proceedings which the Austrian Government dignified with the name of trials, and by which Metternich and the Emperor vainly endeavoured to crush out the spirit which animated the Italians to resistance to their rule.

Andryane was repeatedly assured that his own fate was already determined by the papers found in his possession, that he would be hanged unless he revealed all that he knew, and that there was no appeal from the sentences of the Commission. He knew but little, however, and the little he did know he was determined not to divulge. While subject to these interrogatories, he found relief from the terrible mental suffering which they induced in the discovery of the mode of communication adopted by the political prisoners confined in the adjoining cells. This consisted in tapping on the intermediate wall, the number of taps corresponding with the place that each letter occupies in the alphabet. By this means they were enabled to hold long and frequent conversations.

After eight months of mental torture, the examinations came to a close, and the prisoners were removed to the prison of Porta Nuova to await their sentence. Andryane soon discovered that the inmate of one of the cells adjoining his own was the illustrious Con-falionieri, with whom he had long been anxious to be brought into connexion, and in company with whom, as he had been confidentially informed by one of the Commissioners, he was to suffer the extreme penalty of the law. Communication was established between them by the wall-rapping system, and it was Confalionieri from whom Andryane received a second intimation of his doom. He was lying awake, about the second hour of the morning, when he heard some taps on the wall, and rose to listen. "The sentences have been confirmed by the Emperor," tapped Confalionieri. "They will be executed in a few days. I shall be hanged."

"In the name of Heaven," returned Andryane, "tell me whether I am condemned to the same punishment as yourself?"

There was no answer; and Andryane rightly interpreted his friend's silence as an affirmative. Both had been condemned to death, and the Emperor had confirmed the sentences; but the father and the wife of Confalionieri, and the sister of Andryane, were making energetic efforts to obtain a commutation of the sentences, and, backed as they were by the Empress and the Viceroy, by a petition from the Lombard nobles, and from the Archbishop of Milan and his clergy, their efforts were successful. But the condemned men were to be exposed on the pillory, and then to be imprisoned for life in the fortress of Spielberg.

On his arrival at that dismal fortress in the vicinity of Brunn, with which the world has been made familiar by the pathetic narrative of Pellico, Andryane was confined in a dark and narrow cell, fettered, and habited in the garb of an ordinary convict. The gaolers, more humane than the rulers, supplied him with a pen and ink and some scraps of paper ; and a convict, who was allowed to wait upon the prisoners, opened a communication for him with Pellico and Maroncelli. He had not been long in the fortress when this man brought him the following note :—

“ We are ignorant of your name ; but your misfortunes and ours are the same, and on this ground we address you. Let us know who you are ; tell us about Milan, about Italy, about everything. During the two years that we have been here no news has reached us. Write without fear ; we vouch for the messenger. Reply quickly, for we burn to hear by what fatal destiny you, like us, have been buried in the tombs of Spielberg.

PIETRO MARONCELLI.”

The correspondence thus established was the only consolation of the prisoners during their long incarceration in that horrible place. At the end of eight years' confinement, Andryane had so nearly lost his sight that four surgeons, sent by the Emperor to examine him, reported that his case would be irremediable if his imprisonment was prolonged. His sister was at that time making the most strenuous efforts to obtain his release. Three times she procured, by means of powerful interest, an interview with the Emperor, to implore mercy for her brother ; but always without success. On the second occasion Francis, who seemed excited by her presence, answered her very sharply.

“ Get up, get up !” he exclaimed. “ If I had known that you came to ask his pardon, I would not have received you. I cannot grant it; my duty forbids it. Unless I make a striking example of this case, I shall have more of these rascals come to create disturbances here. If any more Frenchmen come, they shall certainly be hanged. Your brother ought to have been hanged."

To the poor woman's appeal to be allowed to see her brother sometimes, if only once a year, or even to be allowed to write to him, and receive a letter from him, with the same long interval, the Emperor's reply was, "Impossible!—impossible!" Her third appeal was successful, the Emperor having then received the report of the surgeons who had been sent to Spielberg to examine the prisoner's eyes. Even then it was stipulated that his liberation should be kept secret, and it was with some difficulty that permission was obtained for the communication of the release to Andryane's relatives in France.

"To your own family alone," said the Emperor. "I do not wish to be tormented by my Italian subjects."

Upon that condition, Andryane was released, "presenting the appearance," as his sister recorded in her journal, "of an old man, by his bent figure and his cadaverous complexion."

During the imprisonment of the Carbonaro leaders in the fortress of Spielberg the cause for which they suffered was in that state of depression which suggests the consolatory reflection, "when matters get to the worst, they must mend." The Holy Alliance spread the pall of despotism over all the broad tract between the Baltic and the Mediterranean, and from the Ural Mountains to the Rhine; and the black shadow extended to the Atlantic waves that break against the western shores of the British Islands and the Iberian Peninsula. The Carbonari did not abandon their organisation, but they remained inactive, waiting for the next breeze that might stir the long stagnant atmosphere of the moral world. In France, repeated failures resulted in dissensions, and, while the republicans adhered firmly to Lafayette, the constitutional monarchists formed a separate section, of which Manuel was the centre.

In the meantime, death was removing those of their ablest chiefs who were not languishing in prison or pining in exile. General Foy, whose frank and noble character, unflinching advocacy of the cause of liberty and humanity, great talents, military and literary fame, and brilliant oratorical powers, made him one of the most popular men of his time, died in the autumn of 1825. He was buried in the beautiful cemetery of Père la Chaise, in the presence of all the Liberal deputies and an immense concourse of all ranks of the people. Casimir Perier delivered an oration at the grave, and, on a touching allusion being made to the poverty in which the deceased had left his family, a proposition was made for the adoption of his orphan children by the assembled throng, and responded to by an instant and enthusiastic cry of "We swear it!" A subscription was opened for the erection of a monument, and to provide for the children of the patriot General; and a very large amount was obtained, the banker Laffitte contributing two thousand pounds, the Duke of Orleans four hundred, Casimir Perier the like amount, and all the leading Liberals in proportion to their means or their sympathies.

Two years later died Manuel, whose funeral was rendered by political feeling an occasion for a violent and unseemly struggle. The popular demonstration of which General Foy's funeral had been made the occasion had deeply annoyed the Villele Ministry, and the police and military authorities received orders to prevent any similar manifestation at the grave of the man whom they had feared to arrest while living. The crowd wished to draw the hearse to the cemetery, and, on the police insisting upon its being drawn by horses, a conflict ensued, which might have produced serious consequences, if Casimir Perier had not mounted the hearse, and from that elevation harangued the multitude, and allayed the popular exasperation. The funeral cortége was then permitted to proceed to Père la Chaise, where the remains of the great orator and courageous tribune of the people were deposited.

Lafayette remained, however, and he was a host in himself. During the autumn of 1829, at which time Charles X. abandoned a design he had formed of making a tour through Normandy and Brittany, on account of the unequivocal symptoms of hatred and disaffection towards his Government which were being displayed everywhere by the people, Lafayette made a progress through the southern provinces, and was received in every town he visited by immense and enthusiastic multitudes. At Clermont, Lyons, Grenoble, Puy, he was presented with crowns of oak and laurel leaves, attended by volunteer guards of honour, entertained at banquets, and hailed as the pioneer and apostle of freedom.

These demonstrations were ominous for the dynasty of Bourbon. The Revolution of 1830 was not, however, the work of the Carbonari. The throne of Charles X. was sapped by his own Ministers; it fell under the spontaneous outburst of popular indignation provoked by the ordinances of July. Lafayette was absent from Paris when the insurrection broke out, but returned on the 28th, and attended the meeting of the Liberal deputies at the house of Audry de Puyraveau. The Carbonari were not represented in the deputation which waited on Marshal Marmont on that day to demand a cessation of hostilities; and only Schonen figured in the Provisional Government formed on the 29th. Lafayette's appointment to the command of the National Guard was an event the historic fitness of which was indisputable; and it gave him immense influence in the decision which had to be arrived at when the Chambers had pronounced the deposition of Charles X.

Schonen was one of the Commissioners by whom the abdication of Charles was negotiated on the part of the Provisional Government; and Constant was one of the authors of the declaration of principles addressed by the Chamber of Deputies to the people of France, and in which all the guarantees of freedom were announced in the name of the Duke of Orleans. But the Carbonari had little part in the Revolution, and Dupont was the only member of the Society whom Louis Philippe called to his councils in the first instance. Constant died before the Government was settled, and his funeral was the occasion of a demonstration as imposing as the scene enacted at the grave of General Foy. Mérilhou was subsequently appointed Minister of Religion and Public Instruction, but in a few months succeeded Dupont, who resigned with Lafayette when the Chamber of Deputies, before the close of the year, virtually dismissed the latter from the command of the National Guards by abolishing the title of Commander-General of that body.

In Italy the news of the Revolution which had been brought about in France fell like a spark upon tinder. The Carbonari of the Peninsula were eager to drive out the Austrians, and unite the Papal States, the minor duchies, the kingdom of Sardinia, and the Lombardo-Venetian vice-royalty under the sovereignty of the Duke of Modena, who encouraged his friend Menotti, the foremost patriot of Central Italy, to hope for his adherence to the scheme. The project was not so hopeful as it seemed to Menotti, for all the Italian princes were allied with the Hapsburgs by relationship or marriage, and the Italians had been for centuries so far from regarding themselves as one people that anything like hearty union for a common object by the Piedmontese, the Lombards, the Romagnese, and the Modenese was not yet probable. To minds glowing with enthusiasm it seemed, however, only necessary to unfurl the Italian tricolour in order to rally beneath it all the young men of Italy; and, if any doubt mingled with their hopes, it was that they might not be able, single handed, to cope with the military power of Austria.

There was considerable excitement in Milan during the autumn of 1830, but the presence of a large Austrian force and the vigilance of the police prevented any outbreak. In the Papal States and the duchies of Parma and Modena, where the Governments were weaker and worse administered, the popular discontent had risen to the point of desperation, and Bologna, for these reasons, became the centre of the conspiracy, which had its chief ramifications in Parma, Modena, Ferrara, Ravenna, and Ancona. Between the Carbonaro lodges of the ducal capitals and those of the Papal States there was not, however, the cordial co-operation which was so necessary to success; and the Modenese leader does not seem to have been well informed as to the popular feeling in Lombardy and Piedmont. He relied very much upon the support of France in the event of Austria's forcible intervention, and it is conceivable that the plans of the Carbonari would have been characterised by greater unity if they had been assured from the first that they had only their compatriots to back them, whether Austria interfered or not.

The Duke of Modena, on his part, was divided between his ambition and his hatred of the principles of the Revolution. He would have had no objection to assume a regal crown, but liberal institutions were not regarded with more favour by him than by Ferdinand of Naples. He dissembled, however, and in October told Menotti and Misley, the agent of a revolutionary committee in Paris, that he wished them success in their hazardous enterprise, and hoped to have an opportunity of proving himself a good Italian, ready to sacrifice everything for the welfare of his country. Menotti was not quite his dupe, as is shown by the following extract from a letter which he wrote to Misley after the latter's return to Paris:—

“ We have arranged everything very well. On my return I went to the Duke, to keep him fast in the same position. He was satisfied with me, and I with him. I hope I have succeeded in inducing him to perform some acts of grace for the new year; but I believe nothing until I see it. Everything is quiet here, and all is going on for the best. It was impossible to proceed rightly without a centre; besides, I was not enough, single-handed, for everything. The Romagna continues to be in the greatest fermentation, but it will not stir. Are the Piedmontese definitively agreed with us? Adieu. I am impatient for news from you."

Money was urgently wanted to enable the conspirators to provide arms, and on the 2nd of January, 1831, Menotti wrote to Misley as follows:—

"The only thing we want is money, and with money be assured we might effect the movement whenever we choose. The old Liberals who have money will not give any. No matter. This will not discourage us nor slacken our exertions. The Duke persists in his determination to let things proceed; so we live, as it were, in a republic. It is said that Maximilian* will come here. I do not believe it. All is quiet in Italy. Will France interfere in case the Austrians cross the Po? This is what we want by all means to know. Organise yourselves as well as you can. We must have Piedmont. Get the union decided on. Adieu."

The French Government had not only proclaimed a policy of non-intervention, but had expressly declared that France would not permit intervention on the part of any other Power in the affairs of any nation in Europe. Lafayette was deceived by these professions, and assured Misley that the Italians had nothing to fear. The eldest son of the King of the French was believed to have affiliated himself to the Carbonari;* what better guarantee could be desired by the good cousins of Italy? But Louis Philippe stood towards his Ministers at this early period of his reign in the same position as the despotic sovereigns of Spain and Naples had stood ten years before. Before accepting the throne, he had had an interview with the Russian Minister, Count Pozzo di Borgo, and discussed with him the eventualities of his acceptance of it. "Accept the crown," was the advice given him; "it is the greatest service your Royal Highness can render to Europe and to the cause of order and peace." He knew what this meant, and what would be expected of him as the condition of the Holy Alliance consenting to abandon the engagement of the Powers to maintain the Bourbons on the throne; but he could not venture as yet to kick down the ladder by which he had mounted to the throne.

The Duke of Modena was in the meantime preparing to enact the part played by the Prince of Carignano in 1821. Before the end of the year he had been made aware by his relations with the Austrian Court that an Austrian army was ready to cross the Po on the first symptoms of revolt, and that France would not interfere. He took his measures accordingly. What his first was is shown by the following extract of a letter written by Menotti on the 7th of January:—

* The initiation of the Duke of Orleans is inferred from his having told Vairdot, so early as November, the date fixed for the rising at Modena.

“I am this moment arrived in Bologna. I must tell you that the Duke is a downright rascal. I was in danger of being killed yesterday. The Duke has had a report spread through the instrumentality of the San Fedists, that you and I are agents paid for forming centres and denouncing them. So fully was this believed in Bologna that I narrowly escaped assassination.” This treachery of the Duke of Modena placed the conspirators in an awkward position. They were not prepared with another Italian sovereign, and they could not allow the popular ardour to cool without indefinitely postponing the accomplishment of their hopes. It was resolved at Bologna, therefore, that the rising should take place on the night of the 7th of February.

One of those incidents intervened, however, which have so often rendered conspiracies abortive. Among the conspirators was a young man named Ricci, serving in the Ducal Guards, and whose father had been marked out for the vengeance of the revolutionists in the event of their success. The young man, trembling for his father’s safety, implored him to leave Modena on the 7th, at the same time assigning no reason for his solicitude. The father’s suspicions were excited, and he imparted them to the Duke. Young Ricci was summoned to the palace, where he was impelled by threats into partial disclosures, which sufficed to put the Duke on his guard. General Zucchi, upon whose co-operation the conspirators had relied, was ordered to leave the city, and the Duke’s precautions made them aware that the plot was suspected, if not known. They resolved to precipitate the crisis, therefore, and prepared to surprise the palace and the four gates of the city on the night of the 3rd.

Forty men assembled on that night on the first-floor of a large house, the upper portion of which was occupied by the Minister, Scozia. The Duke wished to have the house blown up with gunpowder,* but at the earnest entreaties of Scozia that he would not confound in a common destruction the innocent and the guilty, he refrained from that atrocity, and sent troops to surround the house and slay or arrest all the conspirators. The tramp of the soldiers drew some of the Carbonari to the windows, and at the next moment, the outer door being open, soldiers ascended the stairs. Escape and resistance were equally hopeless, and the conspirators became frantic with desperation. Menotti fired a pistol through the door, and the soldiers on the landing and stairs riddled the door with shots in return. The conspirators fired from the windows on the troops in the street, and forced them to withdraw into the cover afforded by the porticoes of the houses. Menotti then made an attempt to descend from a window by means of a rope, but he was observed; one of the soldiers fired at him, and he fell wounded upon the pavement. His companions surrendered at discretion, and the whole were marched off to prison.

This was a bad beginning; but on the following day a bloodless revolution was effected at Bologna, where, on a large body of the Carbonari surrounding the Governor's house, that functionary withdrew, without a contest, and retired with the garrison to Florence. A Provisional Government was established, consisting of Mamiani, Armandi, Vicini, Bianchetti, Silvani, Sturani, Orioli, Sarti, and Zanolini, the Italian tricolour displayed from the public buildings, and a national guard formed. On the 5th, the Carbonari effected a successful rising at Modena, whence the Duke, after burning all his papers, fled to Mantua, taking Menotti with him, for the same reason probably that he destroyed whatever documentary evidence there was of his relations with the Carbonari. Risings at Parma, Ancona, and Ferrara followed, and in less than a week the Papal and Ducal authority was at an end in every town and village between the Apennines and the Po.

* Louis Blanc's History of Ten Years.

The Provisional Government established at Bologna issued on the 10th a stirring address to the Lombards, calling upon them to rise en masse and cast off the yoke of Austria; and endeavours were made to extend the movement into Piedmont, Tuscany, and Naples, as well as into the Papal provinces south of the Apennines. There was little unity of aim among the leaders in different parts of the country, however, and the masses showed themselves more indifferent to the movement than had been expected. Though the directors of the movement seem at this time to have perceived the mistake of perpetuating the division of the peninsula into six or seven separate and independent States, the idea of Italian unity was not yet fully realised among the Carbonari, and still less by the nation at large. The leading features of the revolutionary programme were still expulsion of the Austrians and the granting of liberal constitutions by the native princes. Hence Provisional Governments were established at Modena and Parma, as well as at Bologna, and unity of action was thus rendered impracticable.

The Austrian army in Lombardy had been receiving reinforcements since the Revolution in France, and now amounted to a hundred thousand men. On the application of the Pope, the Duke of Modena, and the Duchess of Parma, General Firmont received orders to march upon Bologna with twenty thousand men, while a smaller body invaded the duchies of Parma and Modena. The Po was crossed in the early days of March, and the authority of the Duke of Modena and the Duchess of Parma was restored without bloodshed. The latter sovereign granted a general amnesty, contenting herself with excluding the leaders of the revolutionary movement in Parma from public employment for three years; but the Duke of Modena was no sooner restored to the throne than Menotti, with as many more of the conspirators as could be secured, were brought to trial. Menotti and Borilla were hanged, to the Duke's eternal disgrace, and several more were condemned to long terms of imprisonment.

A body of the Bolognese insurgents had crossed the Apennines in order to aid an expected rising in Rome, and had reached Otricoli when the Austrians crossed the Po and advanced against Bologna. The revolutionary forces in that city, commanded by Colonel Armandi, the provisional Minister of War, numbered only seven thousand men; of whom not more than a third were soldiers, gendarmes, and custom-house guards, and the whole badly armed and indisciplined.

Four hundred muskets and as many sabres, which had been bought at Leghorn, were seized by the Tuscan authorities. Yet, so strong was the influence of political tradition in Italy that the Provisional Government disarmed General Zucchi and the Modenese insurgents who sought refuge in Bologna after the restoration of the Ducal authority in Modena. The Austrians entered Bologna without encountering any resistance, therefore, the Provisional Government and the armed force retiring to Ancona.

Notwithstanding the public declarations of the French Government that Austrian intervention in Italy would not be permitted, not a French soldier was moved when the Po was crossed by the invaders, except to prevent the Italian refugees and French sympathisers with them from hastening to the support of the Revolution. Even while his Ministers pretended to make a distinction between the case of the Duchies and that of the Papal States, Louis Philippe privately assured the Pope that the intervention of Austria would not be opposed. At the end of February a great number of Italian refugees had assembled at Lyons, with the view of creating a diversion in Savoy, and French volunteer bands were formed to support them. The Prefect at Lyons, believing the declarations of the Government to be made in good faith, at first aided and encouraged them; but he was soon undeceived by an order from Casimir Perier to disperse the assemblies of the refugees, and prevent their departure for the frontier. He thereupon left Lyons on an official tour of inspection, while Baune, a bold citizen, offered to join the refugees with two battalions of National Guards. The refugees declined the offer, however, in order not to compromise the French authorities, and left Lyons in small parties.

The rendezvous was near the frontier, between the village of Maximieux and the bridge of Chazet; and it was nearly reached when the refugees were overtaken by dragoons and gendarmes, and forced to return to Lyons. A few days afterwards, Misley and Linati arrived at Marseilles and chartered a vessel, aboard which they put a couple of cannon and twelve hundred muskets. They were joined by General Pepe, Count Grilenzoni, the advocate Mantovani, Dr. Franceschini, and Lieutenant Mori; but at the last moment the Prefect received a telegraphic order from Paris to prevent their embarkation and lay an embargo on the vessel. General Pepe evaded the vigilance of the police, however, and contrived to reach Hyères, where he heard of the entrance of the Austrians into Bologna, and thereupon abandoned his intention of giving the aid of his reputation and experience to the revolutionary cause.

Bologna had been occupied by the Austrians on the 21st of March, and General Firmont lost no time in marching upon Ancona. The idea of defending that city was entertained by the revolutionary government for a time, and the approach of the Austrians inspired the inhabitants, on that account, with the utmost consternation. Colonel Armandi recognised the impracticability of successful resistance, however, and on the 29th, accompanied by three of his colleagues, Bianchetti, Silvani, and Sturani, had an interview with Cardinal Benvenuti, who had been seized at the commencement of the insurrection, and held as a hostage. A convention was concluded between the Cardinal, acting in the name of the Pope, and the representatives of the Revolution, whereby it was agreed that the city should be surrendered on the condition of a general amnesty. The Austrians thereupon entered Ancona, and the revolt was at an end, General Sercognani, who commanded a column of insurgents in the Apeninnes, laying down their arms at Spoleto on the faith of the convention. Ninety-eight insurgents left Ancona in a vessel under the Papal flag, having little faith, perhaps, that the convention would be observed ; but the vessel was seized at sea by the Austrians, and they were taken to Venice, and subjected to a long and rigorous imprisonment.

In spite of the remonstrances of Cardinal Benvenuti, the Pope refused to ratify the convention, and, like the Duke of Modena, ordered arrests throughout his dominions, and instituted special commissions for the trial of the offenders. The leaders had escaped, however, and no blood was shed on the scaffold, though the prisons were filled with the suspected. The Great Powers, on the suggestion of the French Government, presented a joint note to Gregory XVI., recommending him to institute certain reforms in the administration of the Papal territories—namely, the establishment of a council of state and central and provincial assemblies of the representatives of the people, with the admission of laymen to all public offices. The Pope could only be induced to institute provincial assemblies, and even this concession was nullified by the exclusion of laymen.

The popular discontent thus provoked enabled the Carbonari to fan the smouldering embers of the revolt into a flame, and early in January, 1832, the Italian tricolour was raised again at Cesena. The Papal troops were immediately marched into the disturbed districts, and six thousand of them attacked Cesena, which was defended against them by half that number of insurgents with a courage that has never been surpassed. Numbers prevailed, however, and the insurgents were at length driven out of the town, which immediately became the scene of the most horrible barbarities, committed by the Papalists upon the unfortunate inhabitants. The insurgents retired to Forli, which after a desperate conflict was taken by assault by the troops of the Pope, and given up to massacre and pillage. The survivors of the defenders retreated to Ravenna, and thence, on the approach of the Papalists, to Bologna, the civic guards of Ravenna accompanying them.

The whole of the Romagna was now in a ferment, and the Carbonari flocked into Bologna from all directions. The Papal General, knowing that his troops were more ferocious than brave, having been largely recruited from roving bands of brigands, hesitated to attack a force as strong as his own; and Marshal Radetzky, who was under orders to execute, in case of the necessity arising, a convention which had been secretly concluded between the Austrian Government and the Pope, directed General Grabowsky upon the Po, with six thousand men. These troops entered Bologna on the 28th of January, to the unspeakable relief of the inhabitants, who, much as they detested the Austrians, were disposed to welcome disciplined troops of any nationality as a protection from the barbarity and licentiousness of the Papalists. The insurrection was now stamped out, and the Carbonari were all in prison, in hiding, or in exile.

The French Carbonari continued to be divided, and in 1833 their dissensions culminated in a demand of the Lyons lodges to be informed who were the directors of the Society, and a warning from them that blind obedience to unknown chiefs would no longer be yielded. Repeated failures and disasters may be supposed to have rendered them suspicious, for the French are ever prone to attribute their defeats and mischances to treachery; but the unknown is an important element of the strength of secret societies, and the demand of the Lyonese Carbonari was a sign of the Society's decadence. The vice-presidents made a half-promise of compliance, but it was not fulfilled, and bickerings arose, which resulted in the appointment by the dissentients of a committee for the revision of the statutes. This was an act of revolt which the Grand Lodge could not overlook; a rupture and a secession were the consequence, and Martin and Bertholon, the presidents of two of the Lyonese lodges, founded the Society of the Rights of Man, taking for their programme the declaration of rights presented to the National Convention by Robespierre. This Society soon had branches in all the principal towns, and many thousands of the working classes were enrolled as members. A central committee, of which Audry de Puyraveau and Godefroi Cavaignac were members, directed its action; for several years it played an important part in political agitation. It was not a secret society, however, and its history can, therefore, have no place in this record.

CHAPTER IX.

THE HETAIRIA.

THE history of the secret society which prepared the Greek Revolution is interesting, not merely as affording an instance of the successful employment of such machinery, but also as an illustration of the secret diplomacy by which the Eastern question, in its varying phases, has been produced, and is kept alive. We see, in the Hetairia, a secret association formed for the purpose of preparing a revolution in a country in which it did not originate, and never had its seat, and using for its purpose the support and sympathy of persons of various nationalities, who were not even actuated by the same motives, and had only one object in common—the disruption of the Ottoman Empire. The history of the Hetairia constitutes, therefore, a very important and interesting chapter of the larger chronicle of the relations between Turkey and Russia.

The origin of the Society is involved in some obscurity, which is less dense, however, than that which envelops the formation of the Carbonari. Of the various writers who have essayed to throw light upon the subject, one states that it originated in 1814 with some young Greeks resident in Vienna, one of whom is said to have been Prince Alexander Ipsilanti;

another, that it was founded at the beginning of the present century by Prince Alexander Mavrocordato, ex-Hospodar of Wallachia, then an exile in Russia, with the ostensible object of promoting the education of the Greek youth ; a third, that it owed its origin to the Greek poet Rigas, who, in 1796, while residing in Vienna, plotted a Greek insurrection, but was delivered by the Austrian Government to the Porte, and executed at Belgrade ; a fourth, that it was founded by Count Capo d'Istria, who grafted it upon a literary association, called the Philomuse Society. These various stories are but different versions of the true history, all of them pointing to a common centre, a little circle of educated Greeks in Vienna.

The investigation leads us back to an association which existed in the Austrian capital sixty years ago, and which had been founded for the promotion of Romaic literature and the diffusion of education among the Greeks. The Czar, the Crown Princes of Bavaria and Wurtemberg, and Prince John Caradja, the Hospodar of Wallachia, were patrons of the Society, which had other influential and liberal friends in Count Capo d'Istria, the private secretary of the Czar, and Prince Alexander Ipsilanti, who held the rank of Major-General in the Russian army, and whose father had been Hospodar of Wallachia. The ferment of ideas occasioned by the French Revolution, and the stirring events to which it gave rise in most parts of Europe, caused the thought of the regeneration of Greece as a nation to germinate in the minds of some of the young men, members of the Philomuse, who met to discuss the news of the day at the house of Anthymos Gazi, a distinguished scholar, who had been intimate with Rigas, and edited a Romaic literary journal, which was published at Vienna, and read by educated Greeks in all parts of Europe. The fervid dreams of liberty excited by the Tugendbund caused them to look forward with interest to the Congress of Vienna, in which they hoped, from the Greek and Russian community of religion, and the traditional antagonism of Russia and Turkey, that the affairs of Greece would receive some attention. In this they were disappointed, and, with the example of the Tugendbund before them, it was not unnatural that they should be impelled to emulate it.

It was at that time that the nucleus of the Hetairia, or Friends, was formed by the more ardent patriots among the members of the Philomuse Society; and the credit of its organisation seems to be due to Count Capo d'Istria, who was a native of Corfu, and had entered upon public life as the secretary of Admiral Tchitchagoff, from which he was soon advanced to the influential position of private secretary to the Czar. Prince Alexander Ipsilanti and Anthymos Gazi were probably among the first members of the association, for we find the former in Bessarabia, engaged in the propagation of the system, before the close of 1815; and Gordon, though he states that the Prince was not initiated until the spring of 1820, tells us, in another portion of his narrative, that he was a member of the Grand Arch in 1815.*

The machinery of the Hetairia was admirably adapted for the end for which it was designed. Less simple than that of the Carbonari, the system rather resembled that of the Illuminati in the number of grades and relation of the branch societies to each other. Every member had the right to initiate others; but before doing so he was bound, under heavy penalties, to make the strictest inquiry into their characters and antecedents, and was held responsible for those whom he introduced. The number of grades was five—namely, the Adelphoi, or Brothers, who, on initiation, took only a general oath of secrecy and fidelity to the Society, without knowing what means were to be employed for the attainment of its object; the Systemenoi, or Bachelors, who were informed that the liberation of Greece was to be achieved by revolution; the Priests of Eleusis, who were made acquainted with the progress of the movement; the Prelates, who were admitted to all the secrets of the Society, and deputed to superintend the branches; and the Grand Arch, which exercised the supreme control and direction, and consisted of twelve, or, according to some writers, sixteen members, who seem to have been self-appointed.

The oath of initiation, which was taken by the candidate on his knees, bound him to be faithful to his country, to labour with all his physical and mental energies for her regeneration, to preserve the secrets of the Society inviolate, and to put to death even his nearest relatives, if they were guilty of treachery to the cause of Greece. Every member paid on initiation a contribution to the funds of the Society, the amount being optional, but expected to be proportionate to his pecuniary ability; and signed a document in the following form:—"I, —, native of —, exercising the profession of —, although now arrived at the age of — years, have not yet had time to dedicate a gift to some useful purpose; I now, therefore, consign to you, —, the sum of — piastres, to be paid over to the Monastery [or school] of —.” To the signature a cipher was attached, which served afterwards to verify letters to the directing committee, which kept a list of names, with the annexed ciphers, and vouchers of the sums paid. The newly initiated member also made a private mark on the paper, which the initiator was not to see, and which the Grand Arch used to authenticate any subsequent communication to the former. The money, the document, and the voucher were forwarded to the Grand Arch through the Prelate of the district.

In the early years of the Society's existence no native of Wallachia, or of the island of Scio, was allowed to be admitted, from a suspicion of their trustworthiness; but when open hostilities against the Porte became imminent this exclusion was abandoned. Some of the signs and pass-words were common to all the grades, but others were known to the higher grades only, each of which had its peculiar mysteries. The Adelphoi saluted by placing the right hand on their friend's breast, and uttering the Albanian word sipsi (pipe), to which the other, if initiated, responded with sarroukia (sandals). The Systemenoi pronounced the syllable Lon, and the person accosted, if in the secret, completed the word by uttering the syllable don.

In the higher grades the formulas were more elaborate and complex. The mystical words of the Priests of Eleusis were pos echeis and os echeis, the meaning of which depends upon an omega or an omicron being used in the first words. With the one they mean, "How are you?" and "As well as you are;" with the other, "How many have you?" and "As many as you have." If the person accosted had reached the third grade, he understood the mystical sense attached to the question, and replied, "Sixteen." To be sure of his man, the questioner then asked, "Have you no more?" to which his equally cautious friend responded with, "Tell me the first, and I will tell you the second." The first then pronounced the first syllable of a Turkish word signifying justice, and the other completed it by uttering the second syllable. The sign of recognition was given by a particular touch of the right hand, and making the joints of the fingers crack; afterwards folding the arms and wiping the eyes. The Prelates pressed the wrist, in shaking hands, with the index finger, reclined the head on the left hand, and pressed the right on the region of the heart. The Prelate accosted responded by rubbing the forehead. If in doubt, the mystical phrases of the Priests of Eleusis were repeated, and, if the answers were correctly given, the two repeated alternately the syllables of the mysterious word, Va-an-va-da.

Very opposite lists of the members of the Grand Arch have been given—Mr. Urquhart naming the Czar, the Crown Princes of Bavaria and Wurtemberg, the Hospodar of Wallachia, and Count Capo d'Istria; while Gordon maintains that, "it really comprehended persons of quite a different stamp," some of whom he names. Alison says that Capo d'Istria was known to be one, and that the other individuals named by Mr. Urquhart were suspected; and he adds: "The real members of that select body, whoever they were, were too well aware of the influence of the unknown to permit their names to be revealed; but the course of events gives reason to think that some at least of those illustrious personages were in the Association, and formed part of its highest grade." Some of the names have never transpired; but I have arrived at the conclusion, after a careful study of the subject from documents and the data alluded to by Alison, that three at least of the five persons named by Mr. Urquhart were not members of the Grand Arch.

The contrary belief arose from the confusion which existed in the early years of the Society's existence between the Hetairia and the Philomuse, the former being unknown, and its agents concealing their real character and purpose under the cloak of the latter. It is very unlikely, however, that Alexander, the founder of the Holy Alliance, and a couple of German princes, at that time suffering the extremity of uneasiness on account of the Tugendbund, would have become directors of a secret society for the purpose of promoting a revolution in a neighbouring country. With Prince John Caradja and Count Capo d'Istria the case was quite different; they were both Greeks, and the former may have indulged the idea, as so many of his successors have done, of becoming an independent sovereign and the founder of a dynasty.

Gordon gives six names only, all of them, with the exception of Alexander Ipsilanti, being those of wealthy Greek merchants, to which class he maintains the unknown members of the Grand Arch belonged. It is probable that even a complete list of the members of that select body, as it was constituted in 1815, would not agree with a similar list for 1820; but the name of Capo d'Istria may be safely added, I think, to the names given by Gordon as forming a portion of the Grand Arch in the former year—namely, Alexander Ipsilanti, Count Galati (who had been a jeweller at Moscow), and the merchants Pentedekas, Zanthos, and Sekeris. Prince John Caradja and Prince Michael Soutzo were probably not raised to the Grand Arch until two or three years later.

Moscow being considered more eligible than Vienna for the seat of the Grand Arch, it was removed to the former city soon after the Hetairia was constituted; and from Moscow its orders were for several years sent to the Prelates in a cipher devised for the purpose, under a seal of portentous dimensions, inscribed with sixteen letters in as many compartments. The Philomuse Society, from which the Hetairia had sprung, was removed two years afterwards to Munich, and was allowed to sink gradually out of existence. The Grand Arch commenced operations, without loss of time, by despatching emissaries, called Apostles, to Paris and London, and others to St. Petersburg, for the purpose of ascertaining the views of the Great Powers, and enlisting their sympathies. No support was promised them, and Capo d'Istria exhorted the Grand Arch, through its emissaries, not to raise the standard of revolt until war arose between Russia and Turkey. The Grand Arch was successful, however, in propagating the Hetairist system among the Greeks of Southern Russia and the Danubian principalities, and lodges were opened at Odessa, Jassi, and Bucharest.

Early in 1816, Anthymos Gazi and other Apostles went through Greece, initiating such persons of influence in their respective districts as they thought could be relied upon, and appointing provincial superintendents. Great caution was used in admitting members in the early years of the Society's existence, and considerable judgment and skill seem to have been shown by the Apostles in adapting their arguments and representations to the position and character of the individual whom they desired to gain over to the movement. The time was peculiarly favourable for the enrolment of men who possessed some military experience. On the conclusion of the war the French Government evacuated Corfu, and disbanded a corps of Albanians which had been maintained there, and the British Government disbanded two battalions of capital light infantry which had been raised in Albania and the Morea. There were also many Greek officers in the Russian army released from active service by the termination of the war; and from these various sources the Hetairia received a great accession of strength.

Other Apostles went through Europe, raising money by soliciting contributions, ostensibly for the educational purposes contemplated by the Philomuse Society, whose name they used for that purpose. How far the imperial and royal patrons of that Society were aware of the purpose to which the funds thus raised were applied is unknown. Probably they knew no more of the matter than is usually known by the distinguished patrons of similar societies, who are content to lend their names and pay their annual subscriptions, leaving the management in the hands of individuals moving in a much more humble sphere. It is certain, however, that by this means, and the subscriptions of members, a large amount flowed into the treasury of the Hetairia, twenty thousand pounds having been transmitted at one time from Hydra to a Greek mercantile firm at Constantinople, acting as the bankers of the Society, as the contribution of the Morea alone. The most distinguished men of Greece were, one after another, drawn into the Hetairia, some by unselfish patriotism, some by ambition, more by the combination of both motives. Prince John Caradja and Prince Michael Soutzo were won to the cause by the hope of attaining independent sovereignty, the one in Wallachia, the other in Moldavia; Prince Alexander Ipsilanti aspired to the crown of the united principalities; Petros Mavromichalis, the Governor of Maina, was seduced from his allegiance by the hope of becoming the ruler of the Peloponnesus. The accession of men in such elevated positions led to more extensive affiliations among their relatives and subordinates, and the movement widened as it spread downward, until it comprehended most of the clergy of the Greek Church, from the Archbishops down to the village priests, as well as the majority of the Greek merchants in foreign countries, and large numbers of the more wealthy cultivators of the Morea.

Increased activity marked the movements of the Hetairists during 1818. An Apostle named Anagnosturas was deputed by the Grand Arch to visit the Morea, and proceeded, viâ Constantinople, to Hydra, and thence to Tripolitza, initiating many of the inhabitants. At the same time, Germanos, Archbishop of Patras, exerted himself in procuring the affiliation of his friends, and was in constant communication with Vlassapoulos, the Russian Consul at Patras, who was also one of the initiated. While the system was thus being extended in the Morea, Prince

John Caradja left Bucharest abruptly, and the Sultan nominated as his successor Prince Alexander Soutzo. Alexander Mavrocordato, the nephew and secretary of Caradja, left Bucharest at the same time, and, after visiting Vienna and other cities, settled at Pisa, where he was joined by Ignatius, Archbishop of Bucharest, and several other persons of distinction.

Mavrocordato descended in a direct line from the illustrious Greek of that name who acquired renown both in politics and science towards the close of the seventeenth century, and received the title of Count from Leopold II., for his co-operation in the relief of Vienna, when besieged by the Grand Vizier, Kara Mustapha, in 1683. Several of his ancestors had been Hospodars of Moldavia and Wallachia, and his father was chief translator to the Ottoman Foreign Ministry, being a distinguished linguist. Alexander was educated for the diplomatic service, and displayed the same aptitude for the acquisition of languages as his father had done. At ten years of age he was able to speak and write, with equal facility, Greek, Turkish, Persian, French, and Italian; and he afterwards attained proficiency in English and German. In 1817, being then in his twenty-seventh year, he left Constantinople for Bucharest, so that he had been little more than a year with Caradja when the latter's flight terminated whatever hopes he may have had of advancement in his uncle's service, or in that of the Porte.

Early in 1820, the Grand Arch removed from Moscow to Kishinev, a town in Bessarabia, and on the high road to Jassi. The resolution for revolt had then been taken, and the coincidence of the resolve with the revolutionary movements in Spain and Italy indicates the probability of an exchange of confidences to some extent between the Hetairists at Pisa and their sympathisers among the Carbonari. A swarm of Apostles immediately spread over Greece, visiting every town, village, and island, and initiating the Greek inhabitants by thousands, without observing the caution which had marked their propagandist operations in earlier years. Count Galati sailed from Galatz to Hydra, with the intention, it has been supposed, of heading the revolt in the Morea; but he was assassinated amidst the ruins of Hermione by a companion named Foro, who escaped to Italy, notwithstanding the exertions of the Russian Consul, at whose house both the murderer and his victim had passed the preceding night, to arrest him. Foro was supposed to have been instigated to the commission of the crime by the Grand Arch, or by some member of that body, on account of the intemperate habits of Galati, and the indiscretions to which they led; and there were some who found reason for believing Prince Alexander Ipsilanti to have prompted the deed, through jealousy of Galati, with whom he had also had a quarrel concerning the disposal of the Hetairist funds.

Whatever the hidden motive for this crime may have been, there is no doubt that there was about that time some difference of opinion among the leaders of the movement as to the course to be pursued. Ipsilanti had proposed a revolutionary movement in Moldavia, to which he was urged in some degree by his ambition, and also by the hope of aid from Russia; while some of his colleagues deemed that an insurrection in Moldavia, besides being badly directed for the liberation of Greece, unless as part of a larger plan, would have no chance of success. This is known to have been also the view taken by Mavrocordato, whose opinion of a Greek rising in Constantinople, which was also suggested, was equally unfavourable. The Greeks of the Morea supported generally the idea of a national movement on their own soil, and they had not long before insisted on banking their contributions at Patras, instead of forwarding them to the bankers of the Grand Arch at Constantinople.

Ipsilanti's scheme prevailed, however, and immediately after the murder of Galati a circular letter was sent by the Grand Arch to the Prelates, announcing the nomination of the Prince as Procurator-General of the Association, and desiring them to yield implicit obedience to his orders. This circular was followed by one from Ipsilanti in his own name, and not in cipher, enjoining them to provide ammunition, and prepare for revolt, but not to move until they received orders from him to that effect. Affiliations were thereupon multiplied so rapidly that the maintenance of the secret was due rather to the apathy of the Turkish authorities than to the discretion of the initiated.

A butcher of Zante betrayed the secret to Ali Pacha, but, having been initiated only in the lowest grade, that redoubtable chief could gather from the man's communication only the intention of the Greeks to revolt. He was so deeply compromised himself that he determined to keep the secret, which he endeavoured to use for his own purpose. He sent a priest to Patras to offer the Hetairists, through Vlassapoulos, two millions of piastres to raise a revolt in the Morea, assuring them of his co-operation ; and he told the Suliotes that, if they supported him until the following spring, they might then assist at the funeral of the Ottoman Power. The Hetairists returned a guarded reply, and Odysseus, who served under Ali in Phocis, was equally cautious in responding to a similar message from Veli Pacha, a son of Ali. The Greeks feared treachery, deeming the wily chief of Janina capable of betraying them to the Porte as the ransom of his own head from the block.

In November a priest named Flessa arrived from Constantinople, with money and ammunition for the Hetairists of the Morea, whose chiefs thereupon held a conference at Vostizza. Flessa announced that Ipsilanti had undertaken, with the sanction of the Czar, to raise Moldavia and Wallachia ; that the rulers of Servia and Montenegro were in the conspiracy ; and that the Greeks of Constantinople were prepared to rise, under the leadership of Prince Constantine Morousi, and burn the arsenal and the Ottoman fleet. The Moreote chiefs seem to have suspected some exaggeration, for they wrote to the Archbishop of Bucharest for information, and resolved to await the result of Ipsilanti's movement before committing themselves. About this time a letter in the Hetairist cipher was intercepted by the authorities at Mistra, and, though nothing could be made of it, a man was arrested at Kalavryta on suspicion of some treasonable design. The Archbishop of Patras thereupon became alarmed, and retired to a village in the neighbouring hills ; and an immense amount of falsehood was resorted to by persons who were implicated in the conspiracy in order to lull the suspicions of the local authorities.

Flessa's communication concerning the complicity of Servia was not entirely without foundation. About a month after his arrival in the Morea, an emissary of the Grand Arch, named Aristides, was arrested as he was about to cross the Danube, on his way to Belgrade, charged with an important mission. His papers were laid before the Pacha of Widdin, who, after examining them, ordered him to be executed; but, after the beheading of Aristides, he thought no more of the matter until reminded of it by the revolutionary movements of the following year, when he forwarded the papers to Constantinople. There is no doubt that Ipsilanti had been led by his sanguine temperament and the representations of the Apostles to believe that Servia, as well as Wallachia, Moldavia, and Bulgaria, was ripe for revolt; but he was made aware, by a memorial addressed by the Hetairists of Jassi to the Grand Arch, and dated the 1st of February, 1821, that the movement which he contemplated would receive little support either in Moldavia or Wallachia, and none in Bulgaria, the memorial pointing out at the same time that, though a rising in Moldavia might be useful to the cause as a diversion, an effectual movement could be made only in Greece.

The Grand Arch, in which the influence of Ipsilanti was now paramount, did not heed this warning; and the death of Prince Alexander Soutzo, which occurred on the 30th of January, 1821, afforded a favourable opportunity for an outbreak in the uncertainty and relaxation of authority which mark an interregnum. A revolutionary movement was prepared, and the first step was taken at Bucharest, where a hundred and fifty Hetairists rose, under the command of Theodore Vladimiruko, formerly a lieutenant-colonel in the Russian army, marched out in a body, and seized Czernitz, a small town on the Danube, near the ruins of Trajan's bridge. There he issued a proclamation, and was joined by two thousand peasants and two hundred mounted Servians, the latter commanded by a Servian captain named Provan. The divan, or council of Boyards, attempted to negotiate with him; but he rejected their overtures, and declared that the new Hospodar, Prince Charles Callimachi, should not cross the Danube without his permission.

The Boyards thereupon fled into Transylvania, most of them being robbed and ill-treated by the disorderly bands of peasants whom Vladimiruko's proclamation had gathered around him. The Hetairist chief entered Bucharest at the head of the insurgents and their Servian allies, the bimbashi or chief of the police, a Greek named Sava, who was now the sole representative of authority, retiring into the Archbishop's palace. He then issued an address, suggesting a petition to the Sultan for certain administrative reforms, a proceeding which caused him to be suspected by Ipsilanti of aiming at the Hospodarship.

Ipsilanti had, in the meantime, sent to Jassi his secretary Lassani, to prepare events in that capital; but he revoked that agent's powers at the end of February, and sent in his stead an officer named Dukas. Though the Hospodar was a member of the Hetairia, Ipsilanti concealed his design from him, and announced to him that he was going to Laybach to submit the Eastern question to the Holy Alliance. On the night of the 5th of March, however, Dukas assembled the chief Hetairists of Jassi, and informed them that the Procurator-General would arrive on the following day; and, on the evening of the 6th, Ipsilanti, having crossed the Pruth at Skuleni, entered Jassi, accompanied by his brothers, George and Nicholas, Prince George Cantazucene, a Greek named Manos, a Polish officer named Garnofski, and a few servants, and escorted by two hundred mounted Hetairists, who had left Jassi for that purpose.

He immediately had a private interview with Prince Michael Soutzo, and on the following morning issued a proclamation, calling upon the Moldavians to assert their independence, and assuring them that there was nothing to fear, as "a great Power was ready to punish the insolence of the Turks." The Moldavians did not respond to the summons as they had been expected to do, however, and, from this cause and the want of cannon and ammunition, the movements of Ipsilanti were characterised by slowness and uncertainty. On the 11th, the standard of the Hetairia, on which a phoenix was emblazoned, symbolising the resurrection of Greece, was consecrated with great pomp in the Cathedral of Jassi, in the presence of all the civil and military functionaries, who took an oath of fidelity to the cause of Greek nationality.

Encouraged by these revolutionary proceedings, and by the assurance of Russian support implied in Ipsilanti's proclamation, the Christian rabble rose in Jassi and Galatz, where they murdered all the Mahomedans they could find, plundered their houses, and set them on fire. These outrages, besides casting a slur upon the movement, provoked a terrible retaliation when they became known at Constantinople. The suspicion was strong on the part of the Sultan and his Ministers that the movement had been instigated by Russia; for, though the secret agency of the Hetairia was unknown, the allusion in Ipsilanti's proclamation was unmistakable, and he had besides asserted that the aid of Russia was certain, and made requisitions of horses and provisions for a Russian force alleged to be advancing towards the Pruth. Baron Strogonoff assured the Porte, however, that the insurrection in the Danubian principalities was not sanctioned by the Government; and Count Nesselrode announced officially that the Czar "could not regard the enterprise of Ipsilanti otherwise than as the effect of the exaltation which characterised the present epoch, conjoined with the levity and inexperience of that young man, whose name had been ordered to be erased from the roll of the Russian army."

Alexander told Châteaubriand, at a later period, that he "discerned in the troubles in the Peloponnesus the mark of the Revolution, and from that moment kept aloof from them." His well-known horror of the Revolution, conceived during that tremendous upheaval which is one of the most striking landmarks of European history, and expressed in the Holy Alliance, induces belief in the sincerity of this avowal; but, however much his belief in the divine right of kings may have been shocked, he could not, despot though he was, restrain the enthusiasm of his subjects in the cause of their co-religionists. It is hard to sound the depths of such a mind as Alexander's; but it seems certain that, though he may have cherished the idea of a deliverance of the Christian subjects of the Sultan by the armies of Russia, such an event would have differed widely, from his point of view, from a revolt unsanctioned by any authority which he would deem legitimate. The Hetairists had not acted upon the advice which he gave them, through Capo d'Istria, in 1815, and he would not sanction a revolt in Moldavia or the Morea any more than in Italy or Spain.

The excitement which the Hetairist movements in Moldavia and Wallachia produced was as great in Russia, however, as in Greece. Ipsilanti's proclamation was read publicly at Odessa, and, amidst manifestations of the utmost enthusiasm, a subscription was opened for the advancement of the Greek cause. At Constantinople, on the other hand, the Patriarch and Synod of the Greek Church issued a manifesto, exhorting their co-religionists to remain loyal to the Sultan. The exhortation was disregarded; probably it was regarded only as a device to avert suspicion from the hierarchy.

Finding that the Moldavians did not rise, as he had expected, Ipsilanti left Jassi on the 13th, at the head of eight hundred horsemen, three-fourths of whom were Arnauts, and the remainder Moldavians, except a few Cossacks, who had deserted from the Russian army for the sake of plunder. His disappointment and perplexity caused him to move slowly, and he did not reach Fokshany until the 20th, when his little force was joined by two hundred men, a mixture of Albanians, Bulgarians, Greeks, and Wallachians, who had been concerned in the outrages at Galatz, from which port they had brought two light guns, taken from a vessel lying there. Their leader was an Arnaut officer named Caravia, whom Ipsilanti at once made a General of Division, thereby greatly offending Dukas and Manos.

After a week of total inaction a council was held, in which the jealousy and dislike with which Caravia was regarded were manifested in a quarrel between that officer and Dukas, who advised different courses. The latter proposed a rapid advance to Bucharest, and, this being approved by Ipsilanti, Dukas pushed forward with the vanguard, and reached that city on the 8th of April. Ipsilanti was joined on the way by two hundred Greek horsemen, led by Georgaki, one of the most heroic of the Greek patriots, whose accession raised the insurgent force to twelve hundred. The advance of the main body continued to be slow, Ipsilanti having doubts of the fidelity of Vladimiroko, who, on his part, secluded himself, declaring that he feared treachery from Sava.

A great number of young Greeks had by this time arrived from all the neighbouring countries, and Ipsilanti formed them into the Sacred Battalion, the command of which was given to Prince George Cantazucene. The men of this corps were clothed in black, like the German volunteers of the Tugendbund, and displayed on their breasts a cross with the words, "In this sign you shall conquer," which, according to tradition, had blazed along the cross seen by Constantine in the heavens. The rest of the force was formed into two divisions, which were commanded by Ipsilanti's brothers.

The Wallachians did not respond to the call of the Hetairists with more enthusiasm than the Moldavians, however, and Ipsilanti found himself at once confronted with a Turkish army, unsupported by the people and disavowed by the Czar. On the 9th of April two proclamations appeared at Jassi in the name of the Czar, one summoning Ipsilanti and his partisans to surrender and receive the punishment due to them as disturbers of the public peace, the other calling upon the Moldavian insurgents to submit themselves to the lawfully constituted authorities. The Moldavian council of Boyards immediately assembled, demanded the resignation of Prince Michael Soutzo, who abandoned his post in dismay, and proclaimed the Hetairists as traitors and rebels.

Ipsilanti was at Messid, on his way to Bucharest, when he heard of these proclamations, and received letters from Count Nesselrode and Count Capo d'Istria, reproaching himself bitterly for his rashness and folly, and advising him to avoid hostilities with the Turks, and make the best terms he could with the Sultan. Consternation fell upon the whole force, and Georgaki headed a deputation of officers to learn from Ipsilanti what private instructions he had from the Czar. He would give no explanation, but immediately directed his march towards the western borders of Wallachia, ostensibly for the purpose of rousing the Servians, but really that he might be near the Austrian frontier in the event of danger.

Vladimiruko shut himself up with a few followers in the monastery of Kotroczeni, near Bucharest, and opened negotiations with the Pacha of Silistria, through the kaimakan, or deputy, of Prince Charles Callimachi, with the view of making his peace with the Porte by betraying the Hetairia. At the same time he was corresponding with the fugitive Boyards in Transylvania, in the hope of inducing them to solicit from the Sultan his nomination to the Hospodarship as the reward of his services.

Ipsilanti had resolved not to abandon the enterprise without a fight, and, entrenching himself at Tergovisht, sent Georgaki to occupy the road from Bucharest to Hermanstadt, and Dukas to hold that from the former city to Kronstadt. The lead was stripped from the roof of the ancient cathedral to make bullets, and an attempt made to purchase gunpowder in Transylvania. In this he was unsuccessful, but a supply was intercepted which some of the fugitive Wallachian Boyards had sent from Kronstadt for the use of Vladimiruko. The situation was, however, precarious and unpromising. The Arnauts plundered the neighbouring villages, the Greeks would obey only their own officers, dissension was renewed between Dukas and Caravia, and the treachery of Vladimiruko soon became more than suspected. A week after the insurgents reached Tergovisht a courier was intercepted between Bucharest and Giurgevo, bearing letters which showed that Vladimiruko was offering to sell the Hetairia to the Sultan for the Hospodarship; and a day or two afterwards another was seized on his way from Kronstadt to Bucharest with letters from the fugitive Boyards, which proved that Vladimiruko had secured their support to his ambitious design.

There being as yet no Turkish troops in the principalities, the Hetairists were able to traverse them in every direction without encountering any resistance; and, on the 23rd of April, Pentedekas appeared in Jassi, and at the head of two hundred men seized the palace, overthrew the Divan, and restored the authority of the Hetairia. The Turks at length crossed the Danube, and, on the 13th of May, Yussuf Pacha, with two thousand men, attacked Galatz, which was defended by two hundred Greek sailors, under a captain named Athanasius. The defence was heroic, but the Greeks were overpowered by numbers, and at night set fire to the town and retreated to Jassi. Yussuf Pacha hesitated to advance into the interior, however, and on the 22nd Prince George Cantazucene entered Moldavia with a thousand horsemen, and advanced rapidly to the capital, disregarding the order of Ipsilanti for his return, which was sent after him on a Turkish force marching towards Bucharest.

Four thousand Turks entered the Wallachian capital on the 27th, and Vladimiruko, having made terms for himself with the Pacha of Silistria, withdrew in the night, with four thousand Wallachians, four guns, and two hundred and fifty mounted Servians and Bulgarians, with the aim of turning Ipsilanti's right, while the Pacha attacked in front. The Grand Arch had succeeded, however, in organising a conspiracy against him among his officers, through Provan and Makedonski, the latter a Russian of Greek descent, who had been a captain in the Russian army; and on reaching Goleshti he was met by Georgaki and his Greeks, arrested in his own camp, and taken a prisoner to Tergovisht. On being taken before Ipsilanti and reproached with his treachery, he protested his innocence, and declared that he had been trying to draw the Turks into a snare; but the proofs of his treason were plain, and, at a word from Ipsilanti, Caravia and Lassani cut him down with their sabres, and despatched him on the spot. His followers joined the insurgents, whose strength was raised by their junction to six thousand men and seven guns, exclusive of the force at Jassi.

The Turks continued to advance, and, in addition to the troops marching from Bucharest, another body was moving up from Kalafat. Ipsilanti proposed to break up his camp and march against the latter force, and, having defeated it, to turn upon the Pacha of Silistria; but the movement was delayed until the enemy was close upon him, and, though Dukas repulsed the vanguard of the Pacha, he was compelled to fall back upon the main body. Dukas defeated the Turks again on the 8th of June, but not being supported by Colocotroni, who declined to fight in the dusk, he was obliged to retire within the entrenchments. The Turks then attacked a small redoubt held by some Greeks, who repulsed four assaults, but abandoned the post on the enemy's guns opening fire upon it.

The insurgents retreated under cover of the night in some confusion, and many of the Wallachians deserted on the march. In a few days, however, they were in a strong position behind the Dumbovitza, where Ipsilanti resolved to make a stand. The Pacha hesitated to attack them, as the river is deep and the bridge crossing it narrow; but Caravia, always headstrong, and on this occasion intoxicated, led his Arnauts across the bridge, without orders, and the Sacred Battalion, seeing the enemy fall back, were impelled by their enthusiasm to follow. They had no sooner crossed the bridge than a large body of Turkish cavalry made an impetuous charge, drove back the Arnauts, captured the standard of the Hetairia, and made terrible havoc in the ranks of the Greeks, who vainly strove to stem the torrent. Georgaki charged at the head of a hundred Greek horsemen, recovered the standard, and rescued the remnant of the Sacred Battalion, who lost three hundred and fifty of their number. About thirty of the Arnauts and twenty of Georgaki's devoted band were also slain, and by this result of Caravia's misconduct the last hope of Ipsilanti was destroyed. He retreated northward, unpursued by the enemy, and immediately prepared to abandon the enterprise, and take refuge beyond the Austrian frontier.

Having obtained the permission of the Austrian authorities to proceed to Hermanstadt, he sent off most of his troops in different directions, and crossed the frontier, accompanied by his brothers, Colocotroni, Garnofski, a Greek officer named Orfanos, and his secretary, Lassani. On arriving at Hermanstadt, however, he was arrested, and confined in the Castle of Mongatz, in Hungary. His broken bands, deserted by their General, hovered for some time on the frontier. Manos crossed it, and made his escape. Dukas, after being forced across it by the Turks, and driven back again by the Austrians, made his way into the Carpathian mountains with six hundred men. Attacked by a superior force of the enemy, they made a desperate resistance until the last cartridge had been fired, and then dispersed over the frontier. Their leader, after many perilous adventures, escaped in disguise into Bessarabia.

Georgaki led his troops by byways into Moldavia, whence, being attacked and defeated, they retreated in good order into Transylvania, recrossing the frontier into Wallachia, and again made their way into Moldavia. Diamantis, with a few Greeks, defended a monastery with great bravery for two days, capitulating only when the ammunition was exhausted; but the capitulation was violated by his immediate execution. Oglou, after holding a monastery against the Turkish force for three days, repulsed the assailants, and escaped by night through the passes of the Carpathians. Caravia, Provan, and Makedonski wandered about the mountains for some time, and at length, having succeeded in bribing some Austrian officials on the frontier, made their escape into Transylvania.

The Turks did not march against Jassi until the end of June, when the insurgents withdrew, and posted themselves at Stringa, a village on the Pruth. Thence, on the Turks entering the capital, they retired to Skuleni, where Prince George Cantazucene quarrelled with Pentedekas, and proceeded to Kishenev. Athanasius then assumed the command, and repulsed the attack of a strong Turkish force on the 29th, the enemy being placed at a disadvantage by the proximity of the Pruth, which the presence of a Russian force on the other side prevented them from crossing. A second attack was more successful, the entrenchments being carried with great slaughter, and Athanasius and most of his officers being among the slain.

Georgaki still hovered about the eastern slopes of the Carpathians, now and then surprising and cutting up small detachments of the enemy. On being approached in his fastnesses by six thousand Turks, he was warned by the Imperial Commissioner of the Bukovina, and offered an asylum in Austrian territory; but the fate of Ipsilanti made him fear treachery, and, being urged by the Grand Arch to maintain his position as long as possible, and assured that war between Russia and Turkey was imminent, he occupied the passes, and took post in a monastery with a hundred of his followers. The Turks, guided by a Moldavian peasant, turned his position, however, by means of a mountain path, and, the passes being abandoned, he was surrounded in the monastery by an overwhelming force. After a desperate defence, he blew up the magazine, but the force was insufficient to destroy the building; and the Turks stormed the burning ruins, and put all the survivors to the sword, except three, one of whom, an officer, was afterwards executed at Constantinople.

In the meantime, the revolt had commenced in the Morea, where the flag of the Hetairia was raised on the 2nd of April by Colocotroni, a relative of Ipsilanti's officer of that name, who had held the rank of major in the Russian army, but having made an abortive attempt to raise an insurrection in the Morea early in the century, had since lived in retirement at Zante. Kalavryta was occupied without resistance, and on the 4th the Greeks rose in Patras, fired the quarter inhabited by the Mahomedans, and during three days maintained with the Turkish garrison a sanguinary conflict in the streets. No quarter was given on either side, and the battle raged with all the fury imparted by the double antagonism of race and creed until the scale was turned in favour of the insurgents by the arrival of a large body of peasants from the neighbouring villages. They came into the town under the leadership of the Prelate Germanos, and headed by their priests, singing psalms, and promising salvation and eternal felicity to those who died fighting for their faith. Aided by these auxiliaries, the insurgents made a final rally, and the Turks withdrew into the citadel, from which their guns poured shot and shell upon the town below.

Colocotroni proclaimed the independence of Greece, and as the news spread through the Morea, the Greeks rose in every town and village, and the Turks withdrew into the fortresses. In a few days the revolt swept over the Morea and the islands, and only Corinth, Coron, Modon, Tripolitza, Napoli, and the citadel of Patras remained in the possession of the Turks. From the Morea the spirit of revolt spread into Attica, and the garrison of Athens, unable to hold the town against the superior numbers of the insurgents, retired to the Acropolis.

Sultan Mahmoud felt the ground heaving beneath his feet, and adopted energetic measures of precaution against a rising in Constantinople. Prince Constantine Morousi was arrested on the 16th, charged with maintaining a treasonable correspondence with Ipsilanti, and instantly beheaded; and on the following day ten more of the most illustrious Greeks of the capital suffered a like fate. Then the Mahomedan rabble rose, as the Christian rabble had done at Jassi and Galatz, and retaliated for the atrocities there committed by hanging the Patriarch Gregorius before the doors of his own church, murdering several priests and laymen, co-religionists and sympathisers with the rebels, and dragging their corpses about the streets. Archbishop Cyrillus and eight other dignitaries of the Greek Church were beheaded at Adrianople ; and between four and five hundred Greek workmen were arrested in the capital, and, as a precautionary measure, transported to distant parts of the Empire.

The Hetairist chiefs of the Morea met at Calamata on the 9th of April, under the presidency of Mavromichalis, to concert a plan of operations ; and, on their separation, Colocotroni marched against Tripolitza, repulsed a sally of the garrison, and, though afterwards defeated, rallied his followers, and occupied the defiles between that town and Karytena. The citadel of Patras was relieved by Yussuf Pacha on the 15th, however, and, on the insurgents evacuating the town, the garrison sallied out, fired the Christian quarter, and massacred all the Greeks they could find. By the exertions of Vlassapoulos, hundreds were enabled to get aboard the vessels in the harbour and escape to the Ionian Islands, and others were concealed in the houses of the foreign consuls and merchants. Ahmed Bey then marched with three thousand men along the shore of the Gulf of Lepanto to relieve Corinth, which was beset by an insurgent force from Megara. The siege was raised on his approach, however, and he turned towards Argos, which the Greeks seemed disposed to defend, but fled from at the first discharge of the Turkish cannon.

Argos was pillaged and burned by the enemy, and then Ahmed Bey followed the insurgents to the monastery and ruined castle to which they had fled. Shot and shell soon fell fast upon the Greek position, and the defenders of the monastery capitulated, while those who had taken refuge in the ruined castle retreated into the hills under cover of the night. The Turks then advanced towards Tripolitza, and the Hetairist chiefs met at Leondari, where it was resolved to risk a battle. Their forces took up a strong position in the hills, therefore, their centre being a village called Valtezza, and their right and left on higher portions of the hills. Here, when attacked on the 27th of May, they repulsed three assaults of the enemy, who finally fell back on being suddenly assailed on their right flank by Colocotroni.

On the following day the conflict was renewed, and the Turks suffered a defeat, losing two guns and four hundred men, while the loss of the Greeks did not exceed a hundred and fifty.

The moral effect of this victory was very great, though the immediate advantage gained by the Greeks was inconsiderable. They defeated the Turks again on the 31st at Doliana, where, firing from loopholed houses, they repulsed every attack for eleven hours; and, elated with their success, encamped within sight of the domes of Tripolitza. The news of these victories spread rapidly through the Morea, and in a few days twenty thousand Greeks were in arms for the expulsion of the Moslems. Had they been united and commanded by an able General, their object might soon have been accomplished; but they would follow only their own chiefs, like the Scottish clans, and each chief assumed an independent command. The Grand Arch had provided a Generalissimo in the person of Prince Demetrius Ipsilanti, brother of Prince Alexander, and formerly a captain in the army of Russia. He travelled from Kishinev to Trieste in disguise, and embarked at that port for Hydra, accompanied by Anagnostopoulos, a member of the Grand Arch;

Prince Gregory Cantazucene, the Chevalier Affendouli, Count Mercati, Vambas, ex-rector of the college of Scio ; a Russian officer named Sala ; Candiotti, formerly valet to Capo d'Istria, and now his confidential agent ; and several Greeks from the south of Russia.

Ipsilanti arrived in the Morea a fortnight after the battle of Valtezza, and claimed the supreme command of the insurgent army, at the same time submitting to the Greek chiefs a draft of a Constitution. They rejected both his claim to supreme command and his political scheme, though threatened by Candiotti with the displeasure of the Czar if they persisted ; but, on Ipsilanti declaring that he would leave Greece, he was invited to assume the command, and his claim apparently acquiesced in. The siege of Tripolitza was immediately commenced with ten thousand men, and the Porte was too much occupied with Ali Pacha to attempt its relief.

Towards the end of June, Count Andreas Metaxa, with between two and three hundred Cephalonians, landed on the coast of Elis, where they were joined by four hundred Zanteotes, both bodies being well armed. These Ionian volunteers marched immediately against Lalla, which Metaxa, with the clannish feeling of the Greek chiefs, summoned to surrender in his own name, as "General of the United Armies of Cephalonia and Zante." The inhabitants, mostly of Albanian descent, resented this style so much that they forwarded the summons to Yussuf Pacha, who sent it to Sir Thomas Maitland, High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands, and immediately marched to Lalla. Metaxa having been joined by some hundreds of Greek peasants, a sharp engagement ensued, ending in the retreat of both sides, the Turks retiring first to Lalla, and then to Patras, while the Greeks withdrew to the hills.

Ipsilanti and Metaxa were followed closely by Prince Alexander Mavrocordato. On the 10th of July a vessel under the Russian flag entered the port of Marseilles, having on board Mavrocordato, his cousin Constantine Caradja, and Theodore Negris, who, having been appointed Ottoman Chargé d'Affaires at Paris, had thrown his credentials into the sea on hearing of the insurrection in the Morea. They had shipped a quantity of arms and ammunition, and were joined by several of their compatriots from the universities of France and Germany, and by fifty French and Italian sympathisers, mostly in the military services of their respective countries. The vessel then sailed for the Morea, and on leaving the port the Red Cross, which has since distinguished the national flag of Greece, was substituted for the Russian jack, amidst the roar of a salute, and enthusiastic cries of "Vive la liberté!" On the 3rd of August the Hetairists and their foreign sympathisers disembarked at Missolonghi, with the view of aiding the revolt in Continental Greece, where the Hetairia had not taken root so deeply as in the Morea, and the people were, therefore, less prepared for a rising.

The movement north of the Gulf of Lepanto had commenced, however, on the 13th of April, when Diakos, who had served under Odysseus when that chief was in the service of Ali Pacha, appeared before Thebes, with three hundred men, and occupied the town without resistance, the garrison retiring to Negropont. Being joined by a great number of the peasants, he marched against Livadia, which was surrendered after a siege of fourteen days. Odysseus himself appeared shortly afterwards in Phocis, having come in disguise from Ithaca to Patras, and crossed the Strait of Lepanto in a fishing-vessel. Early in June the revolt spread through Etolia and Acarnania, and Odysseus was soon at the head of a considerable force, which defeated the Turks in several skirmishes and captured the fortress of Salona. About the same time an insurgent force from the classic region of Olympus attacked Salonica, but, being repulsed, withdrew into their mountains, in the wild passes of which they turned upon their pursuers and defeated them. The Turks overrun Thessaly and Livadia without opposition, however, and Odysseus, after defeating them in several skirmishes, fell back on the pass of Thermopylæ. On the 6th of September the Turks attacked him in that strong position with a force numerically much superior, and forced the pass, though with heavy loss; but, being attacked in flank, they were routed with great slaughter, and lost seven guns. Two days afterwards, Odysseus beat them again, and took three more guns. The enemy then retreated into Thessaly.

Mavrocordato's first step was the convening of an Assembly of Deputies from the provinces of Continental Greece; but the appearance of a Turkish fleet in the Gulf of Lepanto so alarmed the deputies that the convention was not held until November, when they assembled at Salona, under the presidency of Negris, and adopted a scheme of Government for the eastern districts. Mavrocordato strove to organise the western districts also, but the intractability of the chiefs, and their feuds with each other, baffled his patriotic endeavours.

Tripolitza had, in the meantime, fallen. On the 5th of October a sudden assault was made by a company of the besieging force, led by a captain named Kephalus, who scaled the wall, planted the Greek flag on a tower, and turned the guns on the town. The signal thus given, a general assault was made, the gates forced, and an indiscriminate massacre made of the defenders and the Mahomedan inhabitants, the former being enfeebled by famine and reduced by disease, and panic-stricken by the suddenness of the assault. The town was then pillaged and burned, and Ipsilanti found himself well provided with cannon, muskets, and ammunition. The large force which had been engaged in the siege was then broken up: Colocotroni and Germanos regarded Ipsilanti with jealousy and distrust, and disputed the extent of his authority; and Prince Gregory Cantazucene withdrew from him to combine with Mavrocordato, but lost heart and left the country. Colocotroni led one division to Corinth, to strengthen the besiegers of that place, which surrendered in the middle of November; Germanos directed another against Patras, where he was joined by Mavrocordato; and Ipsilanti, with a third, besieged Napoli. Colocotroni alone was successful; Yussuf Pacha drove the Greeks out of Patras on the 3rd of December, with great slaughter, and Ipsilanti was repulsed before Napoli on the night of the 15th, when an attempt was made to carry the place by escalade.

Ipsilanti had issued circulars, convening a National Assembly at Argos, and thither went Mavrocordato, Germanos, Negris, and all the leading men of the country. They had scarcely met when a dispute arose concerning the Governorship of Tripolitza, to which Ipsilanti had appointed Sekeris. A compromise was arranged by the separation of the civil and military functions, and investing the son of Colocotroni with the latter; and the assembled deputies then proceeded to discuss the draft of a Constitution, which had been drawn up by an Italian named Gallina. The political future of Greece having been, for the time, settled on a Republican basis, the presidency of the executive council was almost unanimously conferred upon Mavrocordato, who, besides possessing greater capacity for administration than Ipsilanti, was recommended by his not aspiring to military command, or to the absolute authority at which his rival was suspected of aiming.

The independence of Greece was proclaimed by the National Convention at the commencement of 1822, and the Constitution was promulgated shortly afterwards. That instrument established civil and religious freedom, security to person and property, equal eligibility for office, and independence of the judges. The executive power was vested in a council nominated by the Senate, consisting of five members; it had the power of declaring peace and war, and was invested with the supreme direction of affairs, but its members were elected only for one year, and were amenable to the Senate for misconduct in the performance of their duties. The legislative power was vested in the Senate, elected by the people, conjointly with the executive council, which entered immediately upon the discharge of its functions. The Convention, having performed its task, declared itself dissolved; and the seat of Government was removed to Corinth.

The fall of Janina shortly afterwards set a large Turkish force at liberty, and, with the view of preventing it from being sent to the Morea, Mavrocordato proceeded to Missolonghi, with eight hundred men only, a large proportion of whom were Italian, Polish, Swiss, French, and German sympathisers, recruited by the Philhellenic committees, and commanded by Count Normann. Mavrocordato had little capacity for military command, however, and he was defeated with great slaughter, the foreign battalion being almost destroyed. The Pacha of Salonica, with fifteen thousand men, forced the classically famous pass of Tempé, where Odysseus vainly strove to stem the invasion with six thousand Greeks; and, joined by Kurschid Pacha, with thirty thousand men, poured through Livadia like a torrent.

Corinth was surrendered by the treachery of a priest, and the invaders advanced to Argos, which they occupied without resistance, the Government, who had returned to that town, hastily removing to Tripolitza. Ipsilanti marched immediately to intercept the enemy in their advance to Napoli, and, being joined by Colocotroni, with three thousand men from Corinth and a great number of the peasants of Argoli, confronted the Turks with twelve thousand men. Mahmoud Pacha paused, and, in alarm for his communications, resolved to retreat; but Niketas was in his rear, with three thousand men, and his passage of the defile of Tretes was accomplished only with the loss of five thousand men, besides all his artillery, stores, and baggage. Yussuf Pacha then found himself invested in Corinth, for Mahmoud Pacha did not pause in his retreat to relieve him; and the Acropolis of Athens becoming untenable through famine, its capitulation freed Attica.

On a dark night, and while rain was falling heavily, the brave Marco Bozzaris surprised and captured the citadel of Missolonghi, and the Turks evacuated the town, leaving four hundred guns and an immense quantity of military stores of all kinds in the hands of the victors. The siege was soon undertaken by the Turks, who, on the 5th of January, 1823, made an assault in great force, but, being six times repulsed, with the loss of fifteen hundred men, raised the siege, and retired to Prevesa. Niketas defeated a Turkish force which was endeavouring to fight its way from Corinth to Patras, and Bozzaris checked every attempt of the enemy to enter Acharnania.

The political status of the Hetairia did not keep pace, however, with the successes of its military chiefs. The Greek Government accredited Count Metaxa to the Congress of Verona to obtain admission into the European system, but the application was rejected, and the envoy not even admitted. On the Senate assembling at Astros, it was found that the elections had been so irregularly conducted that some districts had sent more deputies than had been assigned to them by the Constitution. The representatives broke up into a number of groups as soon as they met, and the debates, irregular from the first, soon became stormy. A conflict seemed imminent, when Mavrocordato arrived, and for a time reconciled the factions by declining to be nominated for the executive council, and accepting instead the post of secretary. Mavromichalis was voted to the presidency, and Metaxa, Zaimis, and Karalambi became his colleagues, the fifth place, vacant for some time, being subsequently filled by Colocotroni. The military command of the Peloponnesus was also given to that chief, while Bozzaris received that of the western provinces of Continental Greece, and Odysseus that of the eastern provinces. Metaxa was shortly afterwards accused of a violation of the Constitution, and removed by the Senate, Coletti being nominated to succeed him.

Odysseus still barred the advance of the Turks through the pass of Thermopylæ, and being joined by Colocotroni and Niketas, took up a strong position near the ruins of Ascoa, at the foot of Mount Helicon. After some desultory fighting, the Turks, nearly four times the number of the Greeks, made an attack in force on the 3rd of July; but were defeated with heavy loss, and forced to retreat. Attacked in the pass of Cephissus, and again defeated, with fearful slaughter, they retired to Trikala. The citadel of Corinth, which they had made such exertions and such sacrifices to relieve, capitulated soon afterwards; and on the 19th of August, Bozzaris made a night attack on the camp of the Pacha of Scodra, who had advanced to Carpenitza, and surprised and routed him, taking a thousand prisoners and seven guns, with very little loss. Bozzaris was himself among the slain, however, and the Greeks, deprived of their leader, fell back upon Missolonghi, which was shortly afterwards besieged by twenty thousand Turks. The town was subjected to a fierce bombardment, but the Greeks held out, and the Pacha, not venturing an assault, raised the siege.

Dissensions continued to be rife, both in the Council and the Senate. Mavromichalis resigned the presidency, and was succeeded by Colocotroni, who was so little in accord with the Senate that he projected a coup d'état, which was to be effected by his son and Niketas. The Senate, suspecting his designs, removed to Kranidi, declared its sittings permanent, and deposed the whole of the Council. The Morea was divided by the dispute, and the condition of the country became deplorable. The military chiefs refused obedience to the central power, and levied forced contributions for their own separate purposes. Money, arms, and volunteers continued to be forwarded by the Philhellenic committees, however, and among the last came, early in January, 1824, Lord Byron and Colonel Stanhope. The noble poet did much, by his influence and liberality, to restore order and organise the military resources of the country, but he did not live long enough to accomplish his aims.

The impeachment of Mavromichalis and Karalambi was followed by the defection of Niketas from the party of Colocotroni, who thereupon resigned. The new council consisted of Conduriotti, the president, an amiable and honest man, but incapable; Bottasi, whose character was of the same type; Coletti, a very able man, who had been physician to Ali Pacha; Londos, brave, but debauched and tyrannical; and Spigliotaki, who was a faint copy of Conduriotti. Colocotroni and Mavromichalis prepared to resist their authority, and Ipsilanti, who had lately lived in seclusion at Tripolitza, proceeded to Kranidi for the purpose of procuring their reinstatement; but he experienced a very cool reception from the Senate, and failed in his object.

The Greek revolutionary movement was at this time escaping, in a great measure, from the direction of the Hetairia, or rather of the Grand Arch. The Hetairists were divided into several parties, with various and irreconcilable aims. Prince Demetrius Ipsilanti having proved a failure, Count Capo d'Istria was now intriguing for supremacy, in the interests of Russia, through Colocotroni. Mavrocordato knowing that the Great Powers would not recognise a Greek republic, aimed at securing the national independence by the establishment of a constitutional monarchy, and had already suggested the candidature of Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg; Odysseus was dreaming of a separate kingdom north of the Gulf of Lepanto; and Mavromichalis had not resigned the hope of becoming the ruler of the Peloponnesus. The general election of 1824 resulted in the return of a majority opposed equally to the aims of those who would have divided the country into several small States of the ancient pattern, and those who aimed at making her a dependency of Russia; and the only change in the Council was the substitution of Fotilla for Londos.

The Senate now met at Argos again, and, after an attempt made by Odysseus, aided by Negriz, to organise a separate representation at Salona, its authority was generally acknowledged as the only legitimate expression of the national will. The charge against Mavromichalis of treasonable correspondence with Ibrahim Pacha having been pronounced by a Committee of the Senate false and calumnious, Colocotroni felt encouraged to renew his own designs, into which he drew Fotilla, Londos, and Zaimis—an able and eloquent man, but haughty and ambitious. Fotilla was immediately removed from the Council by a resolution of the Senate, and Bottasi dying about the same time, the vacancies were filled by the latter's brother and Constantine Mavromichalis, brave men, but destitute of administrative ability. The conspiracy failed; young Colocotroni was killed in an affray at Tripolitza; Londos, Zaimis, and Niketas, finding the Council on the alert, withdrew to the island of Kalamos; Colocotroni surrendered himself, and was imprisoned in the monastery of St. Elias, in the island of Hydra.

While these divisions were agitating the Morea, Ghouras, a brave but rude and uncultured chief, had defeated, on the classic plain of Marathon, a Turkish army which had invaded Attica from Negropont; and Odysseus, with four thousand Greeks, had overthrown ten thousand Turks under Valesi Bey in the defiles of Grevia. Attempting to reach Salona, the enemy was again defeated in the passes of Parnassus, and retreated to Salonica. But, having concluded a truce for Livadia without the authority of the Council, Odysseus found himself abandoned by his troops, and, surrendering to Ghouras, was imprisoned in a tower of the Acropolis. On the 17th of June, 1825, his corpse was found, with many bones broken, at the foot of the tower; but whether his death occurred by mischance, in attempting to escape, or, as some suspected, by the act of assassins, is a mystery as inscrutable as that which veiled the death of Pichegru.

The arrival of an Egyptian army in the Morea in the last days of February, 1825, turned the scale once more in favour of the Porte. Ibrahim Pacha besieged Navarino in March, and on the 19th of April attacked and routed the Greek army under Conduriotti, which had occupied the route from Modon to Navarino, and cut him off from his base. Redschiid Pacha invested Missolonghi about the same time, and, after a desperate sortie on the 22nd, when eighteen hundred of the defenders cut their way through the Turks, and succeeded in reaching Salona, the place was taken by assault. On the 8th of May, Ibrahim Pacha, having been repulsed in an attempt to carry Navarino by escalade, attacked and captured the defences on the island of Sphacteria, after a brave defence by Anagnostoras, and the place then capitulated. A month later Arkadia was taken by surprise, and Ibrahim advanced against Tripolitza. Colocotroni, who had obtained his liberty, endeavoured to arrest the invaders in the mountain passes, but his flank was turned, and Tripolitza was occupied without resistance on the 23rd of June. Ibrahim then advanced against Napoli, but his vanguard being repulsed by Ipsilanti, he turned his march towards Argos, which was fired and abandoned on his approach. The Greeks then endeavoured to arrest his return to Tripolitza, but were beaten at the pass of Tricorphæ on the 5th of July.

The state of Greece now became most deplorable. Her rulers and legislators had no hope but in the intervention of one or more of the Great Powers, and were divided into parties as their sympathies or interests inclined them to Russia, or England, or France. Soon after the fall of Navarino, General Roche appeared at Napoli as the agent of the Philhellenic committee in Paris, and tried to make a party to support the candidature of the Duke of Nemours, a boy of eleven years. Coletti favoured this scheme, and drew into it Ghouras; but the French Government, through Admiral Rigny, discouraged it, and it was soon abandoned. Colocotroni continued to support the candidature of Capo d'Istria, and, early in 1826, a wealthy merchant named Varvaki arrived at Napoli from Russia, and made great efforts in the same behalf; but he was very ill received, and retired to Zante, where he shortly afterwards died.

Mavrocordato had, in the meantime, a secret interview with Sir Stratford Canning, and negotiations had been opened between the Council and the British Government. Early in 1827, a motion was made in the Senate by Trikoupi, and adopted unanimously, in favour of placing Greece under the protection of Great Britain. Against this course Ipsilanti made a protest, the result of which, after a stormy debate, was his deprivation of the rights of Greek citizenship by a decree of the Senate. The British Government was not disposed to act independently in the matter, however, and the Duke of Wellington was sent to St. Petersburg, ostensibly to congratulate Nicholas on his succession to the throne, but really to gather his views concerning Greece. An agreement having been arrived at, a joint note was presented to the Porte by the British and Russian Ministers, insisting upon an armistice and the recognition of Greece as a semi-independent State. France formally acceded to this intervention, which was supported by the exhortations of Austria and Prussia; but the Sultan resented it strongly, and in July, 1827, a treaty was concluded between England, France, and Russia, by which they bound themselves to intervene in Greece on the basis already agreed upon.

Colocotroni and Metaxa continued their intrigues in the Russian interest, which also received the support of Lord Cochrane and General Church, who arrived in the Morea at this time, and received respectively the command of the navy and the army of the infant State. The result was the investiture of Capo d'Istria with the presidency for the term of seven years, a step which most reflecting Greeks regarded with painful feelings, but which the masses accepted as the only alternative which the situation seemed to afford of the anarchy consequent upon the miserable feuds of their own chiefs. Capo d'Istria, who had been for some time resident at Geneva, visited St. Petersburg, London, and Paris while these arrangements were in progress, and, proceeding from the French capital to Ancona, sailed in a British corvette to Corfu, and thence to Napoli. Most of the chiefs sent in their adhesion to him, and his presidency had the unexpected effect of producing greater harmony.

Hostilities in Greece were finally terminated, in the summer of 1828, by a convention concluded at Alexandria between Admiral Codrington and Mehemet Ali, by which the latter agreed to withdraw the Egyptian troops from the Morea; but the French Government had already prepared an expedition for the expulsion of Ibrahim Pacha, and, though General Maison was apprised, on his arrival at Navarino, of the convention of Alexandria, he persisted in disembarking his troops. Ibrahim Pacha acceded to the convention, thus removing any pretext for hostilities ; and the Turkish garrisons between the Gulf of Lepanto and the Pindus range withdrew or capitulated. The limits of Greece northward were fixed by a treaty concluded in 1829 between the protecting Powers, the boundary following the natural frontier of the Pindus range from the Gulf of Arta to the Gulf of Volo.

Prince Alexander Ipsilanti, who had, in the meantime, been removed from the Castle of Mongatz to that of Theresienstadt, was released in 1827, at the intercession of the Czar, and on the condition of residing within the limits of Austrian territory. Confinement had broken down his health and strength, however, and he may be said to have been liberated only to die. He survived his release only a few months, dying at Verona on the 31st of January, 1828.

Mavrocordato retired into private life on the failure of his project for the establishment of a constitutional kingdom under British protection. Under the arbitrary Government of Capo d'Istria he, for some time, kept aloof from public affairs ; but when he thought he could serve his country by so doing, he accepted an important mission to Candia, and organised, in concert with Tombasis, the little fleet of the infant State.

On the assassination of Capo d'Istria, on the 24th of October, 1831, a Provisional Government was established ; but the Senate nominated Count Augustine d'Istria in succession to his brother, and convoked a National Assembly, which, after excluding the deputies from the islands to obtain a majority in the Russian interest, confirmed the appointment. A conflict ensued, and the minority, led by Coletti and Conduriotti, becoming the majority when the deputies of the islands succeeded in eluding the Russian cruisers, annulled the appointment, and called Prince Otho, second son of the King of Bavaria, to the throne.

During the minority of Otho, Mavrocordato held, for short periods, the Ministry of Finance and the Presidency of the Council, and afterwards received the appointment of Minister of Legation at the Court of Munich. He was subsequently accredited in the same capacity to London, whence, in 1840, when the difficulties of Government were thickening around Otho, he was called to form an administration. He availed of the occasion to represent to the King the necessity of removing the Germans who filled all the offices of State, establishing the political institutions of the country on a sound basis, introducing certain desirable reforms into the Administration, and giving the people some guarantee that their rights would be respected. Finding that his views did not agree with those of the King, he tendered his resignation. His immense popularity accompanied him in his retirement. His abnegation of office, when he could not retain it without a sacrifice of principle, increased it, more especially as he was without fortune, having consecrated his patrimony to the liberation of his country. The Government offered him a pension, as a mark of their appreciation of the services he had rendered to the nation; but he declined it, and his independent and disinterested patriotism augmented the esteem in which he was held by all classes of his countrymen.

Two years afterwards, the revolution which Otho had provoked by rejecting Mavrocordato's advice rendered necessary the convocation of a National Assembly, for the purpose of framing a new Constitution. Mavrocordato was at that time Chargé d'Affaires at Constantinople. Recalled to Athens by the revolution, and elected representative of Missolonghi, he presided for six months, with remarkable talent and dignity, over the most stormy Assembly that had ever been convened in Greece. After the promulgation of the Constitution, he was induced to accept office; but he did so with some reluctance, well knowing that his tenure of power would be precarious. The various sections of the Opposition coalesced against his administration, and offered a furious antagonism to all his measures. In consequence of this factious opposition, he resigned his functions as President of the Council, and, as leader of the Opposition, opposed the arbitrary measures of Coletti to the utmost of his power. In 1848, however, fearing an anarchical movement, as a consequence of the political excitement of the period, he abandoned his opposition to the Government, though without giving it his support.

At the close of 1850 he accepted the appointment of Minister of Legation at Paris, and four years afterwards the political exigences of his country again placed him at the head of the Administration. His tenure of office was brief, however, and on its termination he retired finally to a private station.

In concluding this narrative, it may be interesting, in the present aspect of the Eastern question, to recall the fact that Jeremy Bentham, Sir Francis Burdett, Lord Erskine, Lord Ebrington, Sir John Cam Hobhouse (afterwards Lord Broughton), Joseph Hume, Sir James Mackintosh, and Lord John (now Earl) Russell, were members of the London Philhellenic Committee. Among the Philhellenes less generally known were Dr. Taylor* and Major Beniowski, who were subsequently connected with the Chartist conspiracy of 1839. The latter, who was a Pole, came to London, where, for several years, he lived in Bow Street, teaching a system of artificial memory, and inventing logotypes, under the impression that they would be adopted as a means of simplifying and lessening the cost of printing. In 1839 he became associated with the leaders of that section of the Chartists which hoped to accomplish its aim by insurrection, and to whom he was probably introduced by Dr. Taylor. In a private letter from a member of the Chartist Convention of that year he is thus spoken of:—"I have seen Beniowski, and heard him speak, briefly, and I should think him well fitted to exercise influence and acquire authority over men not very capable of thinking for themselves. He was a fine, tall, aristocratic-looking man, and possessed great fluency and no small degree of audacity. He came to us in the latter days of the Convention to ask us to contribute from our funds to assist in the movements of a society, chiefly of foreigners, with which he was connected, but with whom we had no sympathy." This society may have been either the London branch of the Democratic Committee for the Regeneration of Poland, of which some of the leading Chartists were members, or the Polish section of the Association of Fraternal Democrats, a society composed chiefly of political refugees, which held its meetings at the "White Hart," in Drury Lane.*

* "Dr. John Taylor, some years before the Chartist agitation, had inherited a fortune of thirty thousand pounds, and a valuable mercantile concern. In a very few years he squandered away the one and ruined the other. He was inordinately vain, and used to imitate Lord Byron. He spent the last remains of his fortune in the purchase of a small armed vessel, with which he joined the Greeks. From Greece he got to France, and was there mixed up with the conspiracy for which the two Beaumonts were tried."—Private letter.

As briefly noticed in the Preface, it has been very positively asserted by Mr. David Urquhart, whose disposition to see the finger of Russia in every movement that agitates the moral world is well known, that Beniowski "was at the head of the Chartist conspiracy," and "one of the secret committee of five who directed the whole movement."† But this

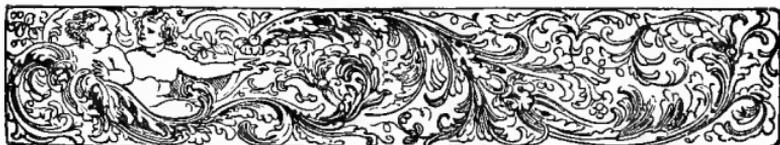

* George Julian Harney, the editor of the Northern Star, was a member of the former society, and the secretary of the English section of the latter, of which also Ernest Jones and Samuel Kydd—the former on the staff of the Chartist organ, and the latter, I believe, on that of the Daily News—were members. The Fraternal Democrats were divided into six sections—English, French, German, Scandinavian, Polish, and Hungarian; and their motto, All men are brethren, was printed on the cards of membership in twelve languages. On the upper part of the card, over the name of the Association, it appeared in English, French, and German; on the left side, in Dutch, Danish, and Swedish; on the right, in Italian, Spanish, and Romaic; and beneath the member's name and the date of his admission, verified by the signatures of the six secretaries, in Polish, Russian, and Hungarian. Colonel Oborski was the secretary of the Polish section in 1847-48.

† Diplomatic Review, July, 1873. The writer adds that the other members were Cardo, Warden, and Westropp, who were all working men, and an individual whom he does not name, but asserts to have assertion is contradicted by the statements of others who should be better informed, and by the fact that Beniowski acted under the orders of the Committee, and only in a military capacity. Thirty years ago I conversed on the subject with one of those whom O'Connor was wont to term the Old Guards of Chartism, who informed me that Beniowski was merely a military leader, subordinate to the Committee; and in a letter written in 1839 by Dr. Taylor I find this corroborative passage:—"The Pole has not gone to Wales, but a much honester man." Indeed, Mr. Urquhart admits that Beniowski was to have had the command of a division of the Welsh insurgents, a position utterly incompatible with the supreme direction of the movement.

"at that time held a high position in the police." Mr. Urquhart, according to a statement made before the Cercle Catholique by the Abbé Defourny, and reproduced in the Diplomatic Review (January, 1873), received his information from "three of the five superior chiefs of the plot—misguided working men, who had not created the conspiracy, but who held in their hands its organisation and execution." But, according to a statement made by Feargus O'Connor in 1850, one of the five was Peter Bussey, a beershop-keeper at Bradford; and Mr. Gammage mentions, in his "History of the Chartist Movement," a man named Lowry, who was supposed, he says, to know more about the conspiracy than any one else. The names of Bussey and Lowry may safely be substituted, therefore, for those of Beniowski and the nameless officer of police.

CHAPTER X.

THE UNITED SCLAVONIANS.

THE organisation whose history has next to be related affords a remarkable instance of the adoption, half a century ago, by a secret association, of the principle of national affinities, which has in more recent times entered so largely into the political arrangements of European States. Thirty years before that principle was recognised by diplomacy in the constitution of the kingdom of Italy, and in the centre of the region dominated by the Holy Alliance, the secret society whose name appears at the head of this chapter proclaimed to the initiated that all Slavonians were brothers, and that the interests of the Pole and the Russian were the same. While Alexander was refusing aid to the Greeks in his horror of revolution, while his brother Emperor was crushing the revolutionary movements in Italy, and Frederick William was consigning to the cells of Spandau the leaders of the Tugendbund, the intellect and patriotism of Russia were revolting against the leaden despotism of the Czars, and, with the right hand of brotherhood held out to the Poles, conspiring for constitutional government and Slavonic unity.

The individual mind in which the idea was first conceived is unknown. Like many other great ideas, it may have germinated in the minds of many at the same time. A number of young officers, belonging to the most distinguished families of Russia, and who had served with the army of occupation in France, after the subversion of the French Empire, had there imbibed revolutionary ideas, which they transplanted to their native land on their return. Many of them had learned in Germany the history of the Tugendbund, and Carbonarism was no mystery after the Neapolitan revolution of 1820. In Russia it was impossible to talk of politics without danger, unless under the veil of secrecy; and a secret organisation, closely resembling that of the Carbonari, was adopted for the purpose of discussing and disseminating the principles which the Holy Alliance, of which Alexander was the founder and the chief, had been called into being to crush out of the human mind.

The precise date of the institution of the Society of United Slavonians cannot be ascertained. The report of the Imperial Commission of 1826 makes the Society appear to have been in existence in 1817; but, as will be shown presently, the dates given in that document are not to be depended upon. The foreign occupation of France ceased in 1818, but the evacuation was not decided upon until October, and the organisation could scarcely be commenced until the following year. Probably it did not exist until 1820. Prince Metternich is said to have warned Alexander of its existence in 1821,* but the Austrian diplomatist can have had no more than the faintest suspicion on the subject, and the Czar seems to have given no heed to the warning. His refusal to assist the Greeks, with whom much sympathy existed in Russia, on account of community of religion, created a large amount of latent discontent, and the promoters of the United Sclavonian movement availed of it to extend the ramifications of the Society from the army to the educated portion of the civil population.

Like the Carbonari, the United Sclavonians had a constitution and a code, the principal provisions of which, according to the report of the Imperial Commission of 1826, together with the divisions of subjects, the most remarkable ideas, and even the style, show an imitation, and in great part a translation, of the German. The authors declare, in the name of the founders of the Association, that the good of the country is their sole object, and that this object cannot be opposed to the views of the Government; that the Government needed the concurrence of individuals; that the Society which they organised would be to it an auxiliary for effecting good; and that, without concealing their intentions from citizens worthy of participating in them, they would pursue their labours in secret, solely to avoid the misrepresentations of hatred and malevolence. The members were divided into four sections or branches. Each member was to inscribe himself in one of these sections, without, however, being debarred thereby from taking any part in the labours of the others. The first section had for its object the advancement of public and private benevolence. Its duty was to watch over all charitable institutions, and to point out to the directors of such establishments, and also to the Government, the abuses which might creep in, and the means for remedying them.

The object of the second section was intellectual and moral education, the extension of enlightenment, the foundation of schools, especially on the Lancasterian system, and generally a useful co-operation for the instruction of youth by virtuous examples, and by discourses and writings conformable to such views and to the ends of society. To the members of this second section the superintendence of all schools was confided. They were to inspire youth with the love of everything national, and to oppose as much as possible the influence of foreign ideas. The third section was required to give special attention to the proceedings of the tribunals. Its members engaged not to decline any judicial functions which might be offered them by the choice of the nobility or the Government; to fulfil such functions with zeal and precision; to observe carefully the progress of affairs of this nature; to encourage upright employés, even by granting them pecuniary aid; to strengthen in good principles those who might betray any weakness; to enlighten those who were deficient in information; to denounce prevaricating functionaries, and to apprise the Government of their conduct. Finally, the members of the fourth section were to devote themselves to the study of political economy, to attempt the discovery and definition of the unchangeable principles of national wealth; to contribute to the development of all branches of industry; to strengthen the public credit, and to oppose monopolies.

The directing committee of the Society comprised the most enlightened and patriotic of the younger members of the nobility, most of whom held commissions in the regiments forming the garrison of St. Petersburg. Prince Troubetzkoi was the Grand Master—an unfortunate selection—the firmness and ability of that young noble being far from commensurate with his ardour. Among the members of the committee were Princes Obolensky, Odoeffsky, Valbolsky, and Volkonsky; Colonel Boulatoff, Major Jakonbovitch, Captains Bestoujif and Kakhofski, Lieutenants Arbouzoff and Rostoftzof, Tourgunoff, a member of the Council of State, and the poet Ryleif, a man of liberal education, enlightened views, and brilliant genius. The Society had its principal ramifications in the capital, and in the armies of Poland and Bessarabia, in which it had many active and ardent propagandists, conspicuous among whom were the gallant Pestel, whose name will go down to posterity with that of Riego, and the brave and patriotic brothers MouraviEFF.

The conspirators gradually matured a plan for a general insurrection, the initiative of which was to be taken, as in Spain and Italy, by the army. The object was to obtain from the Czar the boon of constitutional government, in which, and in the institutions to be established under it, the Poles were to be equal participators. The time for the rising was fixed several times, and as often postponed. A certain day in the autumn of 1825 was once decided upon, but a change in the military arrangements caused the execution of the design to be again deferred until the following May. In the meantime the secret of the conspiracy was not so well kept that it did not leak out, but the information acquired by the Czar was of a vague character, and afforded no grounds for active measures against the authors of the plot. This renewed warning was given by General Wittgenstein, then commanding the army in Bessarabia, and, indicating as it did the existence of treason in the Imperial Guard, it filled the mind of Alexander with horror and dismay.

The secret societies of Western Europe had inspired him with profound uneasiness. He dreaded them more than he had done the armies of Napoleon ; their mysterious symbols excited more alarm in his mind than the appearance of a foreign army would have done. His army, and the rigour of a Russian winter, had routed the latter, but the former might undermine in secret the ground beneath his feet. The astounding discovery that one of these mysterious organisations existed in his own realm, even in the capital, in the army, in the Imperial Guard, came upon him like a thunder-clap in winter. To avoid the danger that might be impending, and upon which he could not put his finger, he left St. Petersburg, accompanied by the Czarina, and made a tour through the provinces. But the dreaded thing met him there also. He was warned of the existence of the plot while in Poland by a sub-officer of Lancers named Sherwood,* who was of English descent ; and thereupon directed his journey southward, with his mind filled with gloomy ideas, and the image of death ever before him.

Bowed down by these ideas, pursued by a vague terror, he reached the dreary shores of the Sea of

* Kelly's History of Russia. Sherwood was subsequently expelled from the army for misconduct.

Azof, and there, in the little unhealthy town of Taganrog, he was prostrated by fever and erysipelas. Again he heard of the conspiracy—this time from Count Witt; but he was now beyond the fear of sword or dagger—the hand of death was upon him, and on the 1st of December, in a dwelling very different from the Winter Palace, ill provided with even the most ordinary comforts of civilisation, the mighty autocrat expired.

The presumptive heir to the throne was his brother, the Grand Duke Constantine, who had for some time occupied the responsible post of Viceroy of Poland, in which capacity he had rendered himself very obnoxious by his vicious and tyrannical conduct. As soon, therefore, as the news of Alexander's death reached St. Petersburg, the Senate proclaimed Constantine as Czar; but it was discovered that the latter had, for certain private reasons, renounced his right to the throne in 1822, by a deed deposited under seal by Alexander with the Senate, together with a decree accepting that renunciation, and nominating the Grand Duke Nicholas as his lawful successor. These documents were now made public, and the wondering people learned that Nicholas, and not Constantine, was to be their sovereign.

The conspirators saw in this strange and unexpected situation, and the uncertainty and perplexity which it occasioned, an opportunity more favourable for the execution of their project than they had hoped for. Believing, from the delay which took place in proclaiming Nicholas, that he was as little ambitious as Constantine was known to be, they resolved to put the latter forward as the lawful Czar, supposing that

Nicholas would then retire, and that Constantine, who cared only for the gratification of his sensual desires and extravagant whims, would be readily induced to grant the proposed Constitution. The occasion of administering the oath of allegiance to the troops was chosen for the manifestation of their purpose, and the preparations for revolt were hastily pushed forward.

A vague hint of the impending danger reached Nicholas, and caused him to resolve that the oath should be administered to each corps separately, in its barracks, to the officers first, and then to the privates. As a further precaution, all the military posts were doubled, and the charge of the Winter Palace, usually assigned to the grenadiers of the Imperial Guard, was given to the regiment of Finland. The morning after Christmas Day was fixed for the ceremony, and it was awaited by the conspirators with an enthusiasm which some degree of anxiety did not diminish. The directing committee was in permanent sitting to receive reports of progress and complete their arrangements. Ryleif is said to have proposed the assassination of Nicholas, and Jakonbovitch the liberation of the convicts and the distribution of spirits to the serfs;* but these propositions were not adopted. Orders were sent into Bessarabia and Poland for the revolt to be brought about at once.

On the following day, the 25th, Lieutenant Rostoftzof, who is said by some writers to have warned the Czar of the impending danger, made a communication to the committee which led them to suspect that they had been betrayed. For a moment all were silent. The pause was ended by Bestoujif. "We have passed the Rubicon," he said; "now we must cut down all who oppose us." "Yes," added Ryleif, "our scabbards are broken, and we can no longer conceal our sabres. Our forces are sufficient; the Czar does not know all. Have we not an admirable leader?" "Ay, in height," observed Jakonbovitch, in sarcastic allusion to the lofty stature of Prince Troubetzkoï. There was no appearance of shrinking, no symptom of misgiving, however, and the conspirators separated with their resolve unshaken.

With the morning came the crisis. The oath was taken by the cavalry without hesitation or any symptom of disaffection; but in the barrack grounds of the grenadiers of the Imperial Guards, the regiment of Moscow, and the Marines exciting scenes occurred. These corps broke their ranks, shouted "Constantine for ever!" and rushed tumultuously into their barracks for their arms. On General Frederick presenting himself before the regiment of Moscow, Prince Tchechipine ordered his company to fall in, and Captain Bestoujif fired a pistol at the General, who fell from his horse, wounded and insensible. Prince Tchechipine then cut down General Chenchine with his sabre, snatched the standard of the regiment from the ensign who carried it, and, waving it with enthusiasm, cried "Constantine for ever!" The whole regiment repeated the cry, and, in despite of the remonstrances of Count Lieven and Colonel Adlesberg, marched out of the barrack yard, and proceeded to the great square of St. Isaac, the sides of which are formed by the Winter Palace, the Senate House, the Palace of the Synod, and the Cathedral of St. Isaac. There the regiment formed square behind the equestrian statue of Peter I., and were presently joined by several companies of the grenadiers of the Imperial Guard and a battalion of Marines.

Alison observes that, "if there had been the slightest indecision at head-quarters, the insurrection would have proved successful." The amount of decision exhibited at head-quarters can be best judged of from the facts. The mutinous regiments were drawn up in the square, within sight of the Winter Palace, between nine and ten o'clock, and it was only at eleven that the Czar was informed that the oath had been taken by the cavalry. About noon the defection of the troops was reported to him; but it was not until the middle of the afternoon that he left the palace and placed himself in the midst of the troops, which, by the exertions of Count Alexis Orloff, had by that time been collected for the support of absolutism. These consisted of several squadrons of the cavalry of the Imperial Guard and a battery of horse artillery.

In the meantime, the number of the military insurgents had been nearly doubled by the junction of companies and detachments of other regiments, which raised it to three thousand; while behind the close ranks of the troops stood a great crowd of civilians, armed with pistols or sabres, shouting at intervals, "Constantine for ever! Constantine and the Constitution!" But there was irresolution on the part of the insurgents as well as on that of the Czar. Prince Troubetzkoi, who was expected to have headed the revolt, failed to appear. Colonel Boulatoff was also, according to some accounts, among the absent, but this is doubtful. He had shown no symptoms of shrinking, and had observed that morning as he loaded his pistols, "We shall see to-day whether there are any Riegos in Russia." Schnitzler, who follows mainly the official report of the commission appointed to investigate the circumstances connected with the conspiracy, pronounces him absent. Kelly, without naming his authority, asserts that he was near the Czar throughout the afternoon. On the other hand, it is alleged that he was among the crowd of civilians.

For some time the antagonistic forces stood gazing at each other, each apparently waiting for the other to make the first move. Even when several battalions of infantry joined the loyal troops the Czar hesitated to adopt any active measures. General Milarodowitch, the Governor of St. Petersburg, at length rode towards the insurgents, and commanded them to return to their allegiance. He was answered by a ringing shout of "Constantine and the Constitution!" and Prince Obolensky rushed at him, musket in hand, with the bayonet pointed at his breast. Milarodowitch wheeled his horse about and avoided the thrust, but at the same moment Kakhofski discharged a pistol at him, and he fell from his horse mortally wounded.

"Who now talks of submission?" cried Kakhofski. The Czar was still irresolute, and a volley from the insurgents, followed by a bold charge with the bayonet, would probably have cleared the square of the supporters of absolutism. But they contented themselves with shouting "Constantine and the Constitution!" and waiting for Prince Troubetzkoi. Suddenly an ecclesiastical procession filed into the square, headed by the Archbishops of St. Petersburg and Kief, bearing crosses, and passing between the hostile bodies. It was thought that the rebels would disperse at the injunction of the prelates, but as soon as one of them began to speak his voice was drowned by the rolling of the rebel drums.

As the prelates and their array of priests and monks filed out of the square, more troops were brought to the support of the Czar by the Grand Duke Michael, whose exhortations to bold measures at length overcame the apprehension of Nicholas that the troops around him would not fire upon their comrades. The order to charge was given, the cavalry in front and the infantry on the flanks; and the loyal troops advanced with an alacrity that must have been inspiring to the Czar, who had dreaded the effect of the order. The rebels stood firm; a red flash was seen along their front, and a cloud of sulphurous smoke rose in the gloom of early twilight, hiding the combatants from sight. Presently the cavalry were seen retiring, while the rebel ranks remained unbroken. The loyal battalions crossed bayonets with the insurgents, but were beaten back after a sharp conflict, in which Colonel Strosler was slain by Kak-hofski, and the Grand Duke Michael had a narrow escape from the sabre of an insurgent, whose arm was seized as it was raised to strike by a rebel Marine.

Again the loyal troops charged the insurgents, to be received with as vigorous a resistance as before. As they fell back again the insurgents advanced in turn, and the issue became more doubtful than ever, though the number of the Loyalists far exceeded that of the Constitutionals. Jakonbovitch made a bold attempt to reach the Czar, but the smoke hung heavily in the damp December air, and obscured every object. The loyalists rallied and pushed back the insurgents, with terrible carnage on both sides, owing to the short range at which they fired. Then Nicholas ordered the cavalry to open, and the effect of artillery to be tried; but to his consternation the gunners refused to fire. The Grand Duke Michael applied the match to a gun, however, and, by threats and remonstrances, the gunners were brought to obedience, and a round of grape-shot sent crashing through the rebel ranks.

Even then the insurgents stood firm, and replied to the artillery fire with deadly volleys of musketry. The iron shower made frightful havoc in their close ranks, however, and at the tenth round they broke and fled through the streets leading to the quays of the Neva. The cavalry pursued, cutting down all who resisted, and by six o'clock the roar of cannon, the rattle of small arms, and the shouts of excited combatants were succeeded by an unwonted silence. Seven hundred prisoners were taken, and hundreds of brave men laid dead upon the scene of the conflict and the adjacent streets—how many was never known, for the corpses were deposited during the night in the snow that laid thickly upon the frozen river, and when the thaw of the following spring came were carried by the current into the Gulf of Finland.

Nicholas might well say to the Czarina when he returned to the palace at the close of that terrible day, "What a beginning of a reign!" But if the insurgents had had a more resolute leader than Prince Troubetzkoi, and a regiment of horse artillery could have joined them which had been confined in the barracks by the energy of Prince Alexis Orloff, it might have been the end of his reign.

The loyal troops bivouacked that night upon the Square of St. Isaac, and immediate measures were taken for the discovery and apprehension of the authors of the conspiracy. Prince Troubetzkoi had retired to the house of his wife's mother, whence, not deeming himself safe there, he took refuge with the Austrian Embassy; but he was surrendered by Count Liebzeltin on the requisition of the Czar, to whose presence he was immediately escorted. At first he denied his participation in any conspiracy, but his papers had been seized, and in them irrefutable evidence of his share in it had been found. On these being shown to him he fell on his knees before the Czar and implored his pardon. "If," said Nicholas, "you have the courage to endure a life of dishonour and remorse, you shall have it, but that is all I can promise." He was then conducted to the gloomy fortress that frowns over the Neva, which soon held many of his braver fellow conspirators.

Poushkin, the eminent poet, had a narrow escape of being implicated in this outbreak. He was a member of the United Sclavonians, and was on his way to St. Petersburg to take part in the revolt, when his coachman, alarmed by some supposed omen, or knowing his master's intention, and pretending to be so, stopped the horses, and wished to return. Poushkin desired him to drive on, but, after vainly imploring his master to abandon the journey, the man dismounted from his seat and threw himself across the road, disregarding all the poet's remonstrances and threats. The delay thus occasioned prevented Poushkin from reaching St. Petersburg until after the revolt had been suppressed.

The examination of the papers found in the house of Prince Troubeztkoi showed that the ramifications of the conspiracy were more extensive than was at first supposed, and a commission was appointed to investigate the affair. The Czar issued on the 31st a manifesto on the subject, in which, while dealing tenderly with the masses of soldiery who had taken part in the revolt, he threw all the blame on the leaders, "who aimed at overturning the throne and the laws, subverting the Empire, and inducing anarchy." We are forcibly reminded, in reading this passage of the proclamation, of the state of mind which prompted the Duke of Wellington, a few years later, to ask how the Government was to be carried on if the Parliamentary system was purified and the basis of the Constitution extended. The leaders of the United Slavonians had no intention of doing any of the things imputed to them by the effervescent imagination of the Czar; no conspirators ever had, a combination for the production of social chaos being impracticable. But to minds constituted like the Czar's there is no mean between absolutism and anarchy, no way of reconciling the monarchical principle with popular rights.

In accordance with the view taken in the Imperial manifesto, the mutinous Marines and Grenadiers were pardoned on taking the oaths of allegiance; but it was deviated from in the case of the regiment of Moscow, whose treason had been of a more aggravated character.

The men most deeply implicated in the outbreak were weeded out, and formed into separate companies, which were ordered to serve in the Caucasus for two years.

Ryleif was arrested in his own house, having made no endeavour to escape; and other arrests rapidly followed, many being made on the faintest suspicion, while fresh revelations were made by the accused, or by the papers found in their possession. The commission lauded, in their report, the readiness with which the persons arrested implicated their nearest relatives and dearest friends; but the one-sided statements of persons nominated by an autocrat to execute his will, and whose inquiry was conducted in secret, must be received with caution, if not with distrust. It is known that the police made arrests almost at random, and, as these included persons who were implicated in the conspiracy, the papers found in their possession guided the authorities in ordering other arrests.

Colonel Pestel, who was the soul of the conspiracy in the south, was arrested by Marshal Diebitsch on his own responsibility. He was brave and resolute, able and eloquent, and, from his uprightness and amiability, no less than from his mental qualities, possessed great influence in the army of Bessarabia, and in his own regiment in particular. He was arrested at Moscow, and sent to St. Petersburg for examination by the commissioners, together with a code which he had prepared for the civil administration of the Empire, and which displays a command of the subject not often found in men whose profession is arms. The code was ridiculed by the commissioners, but many of its provisions were subsequently embodied in the code drawn up by order of the Czar.

The most active of the United Slavonians in the army of Poland were Sergius Mouravieff, colonel of a regiment then stationed at Belain-Tzerskof; his brother Matthew, captain in the same regiment; and Michael Bestoujif, brother of the officer of that name who participated in the outbreak in the capital, and an intimate friend of Pestel. The papers seized at the house of Prince Troubetzkoi incriminating Colonel Mouravieff, an order was sent for his arrest; but he received a timely warning, and evaded apprehension for the time by proceeding to Trilissia. There he was arrested, however, by his friend, Colonel Ghebel, who confined him in his own house; but a party of officers, members of the United Slavonians, attacked the house, and rescued him, after a brief conflict, in which Colonel Ghebel fell, covered with wounds. His rescuers conducted him to his regiment, which immediately pronounced for Constantine and the Constitution. Captain Roglof, however, courageously addressed the mutineers, telling them that Constantine had renounced the throne, and that Nicholas was the rightful Czar; and the Grenadier company thereupon abandoned Mouravieff, and followed their captain.

Mouravieff lingered three days at Belain-Tzerskof, expecting to be joined by other corps; but the suppression of the insurrection in the capital prevented the spirit of revolt from spreading, and on the 15th of January he marched to Ostinofska, and posted his force on an elevated position. Finding himself hemmed in by the loyal troops, he adopted the bold course of leading the insurgents up to a battery, under the impression that the gunners would refuse to fire, and that the crisis thus brought about would result in a victory for the Constitutional cause. They were received, however, with a point-blank discharge of grape-shot, by which a great many were killed; they broke and fled, and a cavalry charge completed their discomfiture. Seven hundred prisoners were taken, and among them were Sergius and Matthew Mouravieff, and their younger brother Hyppolite, who were immediately sent in custody to St. Petersburg.

The interrogation of the accused, the examination of papers, and the preparation of the report occupied the commission five months. The Czar was present during many of the sittings, and took part in the interrogation of the prisoners, most of whom bore themselves with undaunted courage and a firmness that never gave way.

“I knew, before I engaged in it,” said Ryleif, “that the enterprise would ruin me; but I could bear no longer to see my country under the yoke of despotism: the seed which I have sown, your Majesty may rest assured, will one day germinate, and in the end bear fruit.”

Michael Bestoujif was equally firm and courageous. “I repent of nothing that I have done,” said he; “I shall die without regret, knowing that I shall soon be avenged.” He made terrible revelations of the system of oppression and maladministration then prevalent in Russia, which, with the courage which he displayed, impressed the Czar deeply. “I have the power to pardon you,” he observed, “and, if I felt assured that you would prove a faithful servant, I would gladly do so.”

“That, sire,” returned Bestoujif, “is precisely what we complain of; that the Emperor can do everything, and that there is no law. Let justice take its course; but, for God's sake, let the fate of your subjects not depend in future on a caprice, or the impression of the moment."

"What had the Emperor done to you?" Nicholas inquired of another of the accused, as if he thought nothing but a personal grievance could excuse a revolt against his rule.

"We had no Emperor," was the reply.

"That fellow should have his mouth stopped with a bayonet!" exclaimed the Grand Duke Michael, affording by the observation a remarkable proof of his incapacity for the exercise of judicial functions.

"Your Majesty asked just now why we desired a Constitution," said the accused, addressing the Czar. "It was, that such things might not be said."

The report of the commission was not presented until the 30th of May. Taking their tone from the proclamation of the Czar, the commissioners denounced the accused as "wretches" and "scoundrels," questioned their courage, ridiculed their aims as "vulgar philanthropy," and sought by vilification and misrepresentation to make them appear to the world as a gang of miscreants, remarkable only for the enormity of their crimes. Designs were attributed to them which they had never entertained, and miserable recantations alleged to have been made by many of them which were, for the most part, more miserable inventions. Great stress was laid upon the alleged design to assassinate the imperial family, though there was no evidence to show that such a purpose was ever entertained. On the contrary, it was acknowledged that a proposition to assassinate Alexander, said to have been made by one Jakuschkin in 1817, was overruled by Sergius Mouravieff; and that a plan for the destruction of all the imperial family, said to have been brought before a meeting of United Sclavonians held at Kief, in 1823, was rejected. A letter was said to have been written by Michael Bestoujif, proposing the death of Constantine, but it had not been despatched, and there was no proof that it was written by the prisoner whose fame it was produced to blacken.

The commission, composed as it was entirely of military officers, was, in fact, a special court-martial instituted for the trial of political offenders, without the intervention of legal forms, or the permission of the accused to employ counsel or call witnesses for their defence. The conclusion arrived at was, that all the accused were guilty, and it was suggested that the most culpable, to the number of thirty-six, should suffer death by the barbarous mode, practised in the Middle Ages, of breaking all their limbs while bound upon wheels, and then leaving them to perish in horrible torture. Nicholas hesitated to confirm a sentence so appalling in its barbarity, and the execution of which would have affixed an indelible stigma to his name and reign. Six weeks were allowed to elapse, however, between the publication of the report and the announcement of the judgment.

It was then found that from the thirty-six prisoners whom the commissioners proposed to break upon the wheel the Czar had selected five for the capital penalty, not by that horrible mode, but by hanging. These were Ryleif, Alexander Bestoujif, Kakhofski, Pestel, and Sergius Mouravieff; the remaining thirty-one, including Princes Troubetzkoi, Obolensky, Odoeffsky, Valbolsky, Volkonsky, and Tchechipine, Tourgunoff, Colonel Davidof, and Captain Mouravieff, were ordered to be transported to one of the most remote districts of Siberia, there to pass the remaining term of their existence amidst the hard conditions of life which await the convict in that dreary region. No fewer than a hundred and thirty others were condemned to long terms of imprisonment, the whole of the sentences constituting an eloquent commentary on the declaration of the Czar that none should suffer who had not been the directors of the movement.

There had been no execution in St. Petersburg for eighty years, and the announcement that five of the condemned conspirators were to suffer the extreme penalty caused a thrill of horror to be felt by the entire community. So strong was the public feeling on the subject that it was deemed advisable to keep the time when the executions would take place a profound secret, and for ten days after the announcement of the Czar's judgment the capital awaited in gloom some signal of the event. Two hours after midnight, on the eleventh day, the 25th of July, 1826, the tolling of bells announced the near approach of the hour when the condemned men were to suffer, and from each regiment of the garrison a company marched out, and was drawn up within sight of a gallows that loomed blackly through the morning twilight from the ramparts of the citadel. These comprised nearly the whole of the spectators.

The drums rolled, and the thirty-one prisoners destined for Siberia filed from under a dark arch, strongly guarded, and were paraded on the ramparts. Their sentences were read to them, the epaulettes of the military prisoners torn from their shoulders, and their swords broken. Then they filed off again, to take their places in the carts in which they were to journey to the remote wilds of Siberia; and the five men who were to suffer death appeared, with their hands bound, and were placed beneath the gallows. The drop fell, and a horrible scene ensued; Pestel and Kakhofski died immediately, but the ropes by which their companions in death were suspended broke with their weight, and they were precipitated to the bottom of the fosse. They were severely bruised by the fall, and Bestoujif was so much hurt that he had to be carried up to the ramparts, for the sentence to be carried into effect. "Can nothing succeed in this country, not even death?" murmured Ryleif, as he painfully raised himself from the ground. "Cursed country, where they don't even know how to hang a man!" said Mouravieff. New ropes were brought, and the unfortunate men were made to suffer the agony of death anew.

The Czar behaved with great liberality to such families of the condemned conspirators as were left in destitute circumstances; but the widow of Ryleif, who was among the necessitous, refused to accept aid from the man whom she regarded as the destroyer of her husband. Meanwhile the exiled nobles and officers were on their way to Siberia, many of them accompanied by their wives and children. Their destination was the village of Tchitmok, on the river Ingoda, between the lake of Baikal and the Chinese frontier. In that dreary spot, thousands of miles from even such civilisation as that of Russia—and the Irtish, less remote by half the distance, has been called the Styx of the Siberian Hades—they dragged out the remaining term of their existence. In 1840, the Princess Troubetzkoi petitioned the Czar for leave to remove to some place where the climate was milder and where better medical aid could be procured, with facilities for the education of her children; but the lapse of fifteen years had not softened the Czar's heart, and the answer was a stern refusal.

How often, we may imagine, the exiles must have repeated the passage which Ryleif puts into the mouth of a hettman of the Cossacks:—

“That which in our dream seemed a glimpse of Heaven was not recorded on high. Patience! Let us wait until the Colossus has for some time accumulated its guilt—till, in hastening its increase, it has weakened itself in striving to embrace the half of the earth. Let it: the heart swollen with pride, parades its vanity in the rays of the sun. Patience! The justice of Heaven will end by lowering it to the dust. In history, God is retribution. He does not permit the seeds of crime to fall, and no harvest to be reaped.”

CHAPTER XI.

THE TEMPLARS.

THOUGH the principle of Slavonic brotherhood ran through the system of the United Slavonians, the ramifications of that Society do not appear to have extended beyond the Russian army and the best educated portion of the civil population of St. Petersburg. Those among the Poles who aimed at the regeneration of their country were less likely than the Russian Constitutionalists to be attracted by the idea of fusing the two nations into one; they desired rather the restoration of Poland to its former rank as an independent State. While, therefore, the United Slavonians were working for the establishment of constitutional government, with the resolve of including Poland in the boon, some of the most eminent men among the Poles were arming, with equal secrecy, in the cause of national independence.

Under the influence of the liberal ideas with which he commenced his reign, Alexander had conferred a Constitution upon Poland; but it did not long exist inviolate. After 1815 new ideas took possession of Alexander's mind, and the provisions of the Polish Constitution were constantly set at nought by the Viceroy and his Ministers. Upon the seething mass of discontent thus created there rolled back the tens of thousands of Polish soldiers who had served in the armies of Napoleon, and imbibed liberal ideas while they acquired military experience and renown. Out of this junction of strength and enlightenment with a burning sense of wrong and injustice arose a secret society called the Templars, instituted in 1822, with the aim of restoring the national independence and establishing a liberal system of constitutional government.

The organisation of this Society resembled that of the United Slavonians, with which it seems in the early years of its existence to have cultivated amicable relations. The aims of the United Slavonians naturally disposed them to a friendly understanding with the Templars, whose organisation would have been extremely useful to them if the blood poured out on the Square of St. Isaac on the 26th of December, 1825, had not been shed in vain. The results of the investigation instituted on that occasion led to inquiries being made in Warsaw for traces of ramifications of the United Slavonian organisation in that capital, and numerous arrests were made there on the system pursued in St. Petersburg of sweeping into the prisons all who were supposed to hold opinions antagonistic to autocratic rule.

Fortunately for the accused in these cases, the Constitution assured them a public trial and the aid of counsel. After a trial protracted over a month, the Supreme Court rejected the charge of treason, and, acquitting the majority of the prisoners, convicted the others of the minor charges of sedition, illegal association, &c., and sentenced them to a few months' imprisonment. This result of the prosecution was strongly resented by the Government, and the judges, in violation of both the letter and the spirit of the Constitution, were reprimanded for their independent and conscientious exercise of their functions.

The directors of the Templars at this time were Mazefsky, by whom the Society had been founded; Soltyk, the senator and historian; and Uminski, Jablonowski, and Krzyzanowski, officers holding high rank in the imperial army. The ramifications of the Society extended all over the country, but the affiliations were most numerous in Warsaw, especially among the younger officers of the garrison, the pupils of the military colleges, and the artisans. The French Revolution of 1830 gave a new impulse to the movement, and a wider extension among the students of the universities of Wilna and Cracow. The active directors of the conspiracy at that time were two young sub-lieutenants of the army, named Wysocki and Zalewski, who had acquired great influence among the youths of the military colleges, the former by the decision and moral elevation of his character, the latter by his intrepidity and daring; qualities which always commend their possessor to the young. But behind these there were older heads in which were conceived the projects which the young lieutenants undertook to execute.

Several conferences were held during September, 1830, at the swimming school of Mariemont, near Warsaw, and two projects were considered—one to extend the revolt that had been determined upon to the whole of Poland, including the provinces of Lithuania, Volhynia, and Podolia, which had been incorporated with Russia, and those of Posen and Gallicia, held respectively by Prussia and Austria; the other, to confine it to the kingdom of Poland, as constituted by Alexander, and the three adjoining provinces on the east. After mature deliberation, the latter plan was adopted, in order to avoid bringing upon the insurgents the armies of three great Powers at the same time. The rising was fixed for the 20th of October, when the military posts in Warsaw would be held by Polish troops, who performed that duty alternately with the Russian regiments. Thirty resolute young men, armed with pistols, were to be told off to shoot the Grand Duke Constantine during his inspection of the troops; while fifty more, armed with sabres, were to cut down the Russian Generals by his side. The defection of ten thousand Polish troops was calculated upon in aid of the enterprise, which was to be followed by the installation of a Provisional Government and the convocation of the Diet.

The arrangements of the conspirators were for the time disconcerted, and the execution of the enterprise was deferred to the 10th of December; but an order being received from St. Petersburg for the army in Poland to be placed upon a war footing, the conspirators conceived the idea that war with France was imminent, consequent upon the revolution in that country, and they hurried on their preparations, in order both to strike the blow before any movement of troops took place which might be fatal to their purpose, and to avert a war which they regarded as an impending calamity to the cause of freedom in every land. The night of the 29th of November was fixed for the rising, therefore, and measures taken for raising the working men of the capital on the signal being given by the conflagration of a brewery in the northern quarter, and some houses near the arsenal in the southern quarter.

Some mysterious movements in the city, and a vague restlessness which pervaded the inhabitants, awakened suspicion in the mind of Rosnicki, the Director of the Police, and he caused several arrests to be made at random, in the hope of making some discovery among papers, or obtaining some disclosures from the fears of the arrested individuals. No clue was found, however, and he could only exhort the guardians of order to redoubled vigilance. He communicated his suspicions to the Grand Duke Constantine, and the troops were kept on the alert. The garrison consisted of two regiments of infantry, quartered near the arsenal, and three cavalry regiments, whose barracks were near the vice-regal palace, on the south side of the Vistula.

At six o'clock on the evening of the 29th, about forty young men of the military college assembled at the southern end of the Sobieski bridge, between the palace and the arsenal, and watched anxiously for the signals, while awaiting the arrival of Wysocki. A faint light rose for a few minutes and sunk again; the old houses were damp, and the men told off as fire-raisers did not succeed in their object. The police and the military were on the alert, and the non-appearance of Wysocki induced grave uneasiness. At length the young lieutenant came, and, under his direction, a score of the conspirators rushed at the palace, knocked down the sentries, and forced their way into the building, with the intention of seizing the Grand Duke and holding him as a hostage. He had fled, however, and the conspirators encountered only Lubowski, the Vice-Director of the Police, whom they shot as he endeavoured to escape at the rear.

There was still no signal from the northern side, and the faint light from the southern quarter had not been observed. The affiliated students continued to arrive at the rendezvous, however, and Wysocki had two hundred followers when he advanced from the deserted palace towards the centre of the city. A regiment of Cuirassiers was drawn up before the cavalry barracks, and the insurgents avoided that locality; but they had not gone far when they found themselves pursued by a squadron of Lancers. They turned, and, with their backs to a garden wall, fired a volley upon their pursuers. The Lancers recoiled, and a second volley caused them to fall back towards the palace. At that moment firing was heard on the northern side, and a red glow on the wintry sky told them that the brewery was in a blaze, and that the insurrection had commenced in that quarter. The retreat of the Lancers was closely followed by the appearance of a regiment of Hussars, however, and before Wysocki's little band could hasten to the support of their compatriots, they had to engage these fresh assailants. They poured a volley upon the advancing foe, and then made a gallant charge with the bayonet. There was a fierce conflict, and many lives were sacrificed before the Hussars were driven back towards the palace.

In the meantime, a battalion of affiliated infantry had marched towards the arsenal, the avenues to which had already been occupied by a company of another affiliated regiment, under the command of Lieutenant Lipowski. General Zymirski, who commanded the infantry, was a Pole, and, secretly sympathising with the revolutionary movement, he led the remainder of the latter regiment into the Field of Mars, where it was isolated from the scene of conflict, while two battalions of the other moved towards the arsenal. The old houses, which had at first resisted the efforts of the fire-raisers to make them burn, now burst into a flame, and by the lurid light of the conflagration a sanguinary conflict ensued. Generals Potocki and Siementkowski, who, with Hanke, the Minister of War, had hurried to the spot in the hope of averting a disaster, attempted to withdraw the mutinous troops from the movement; but some insulting words used by Siementkowski exasperated them so much that several shots were fired, and Hanke and the General rolled from their saddles, mortally wounded. Potocki was torn from his horse, and received injuries in the struggle which proved fatal.

While the sharp rattle of musketry resounded around the arsenal, the affiliated workmen were gathering in the old town, and the students of the School of Artillery brought up two guns. The conflict, though bloody, was of brief duration. The Russian infantry gave way before the charge of the mutineers, and retired in disorder to the Field of Mars. The gates of the arsenal were then broken open, and fifty thousand muskets distributed among the workmen, who were now turning out in support of the revolution in all parts of the city. This was the crisis of the insurrection. Excitement and confusion reigned on all sides. The insurgents did not know who were directing the movement, and the authorities, civil and military, knew neither its extent nor their own situation. Constantine had fled to the camp at Wierzbna, a village a few miles distant; his bewildered Ministers had assembled at the Bank, but were unable to take any decided measures; the cavalry awaited orders around the palace, and the infantry stood inactive on the Field of Mars. A body of Polish cavalry, under General Kumatowski, drove back the workmen in the centre of the city, but better armed insurgents came up, and they retreated into the suburb of Cracow.

During the dark hours of early morning the troops, with the exception of those who had fought on the side of the revolution, withdrew from the city, and retired to the camp at Wierzbna. The insurgents remained under arms all night, and occupied in force the palace, the arsenal, and the bridges. Armed bands patrolled the streets, and an uneasy feeling pervaded the minds of those who were not in the secret, and knew not the situation. This, indeed, was not clearly known to anybody until the following morning. Then the imperial eagle, the symbol of Russian domination, was removed from all the public buildings by a band of students of the university; and the armed multitude clamoured for a leader in the person of General Chlopicki, who attracted their regards by his lofty stature and the military renown which he had acquired while serving under Suchet in Spain. He was a mere soldier, a good one, but utterly unfitted to direct the councils of a nation. He might have been of good service the previous evening, when he had secluded himself, and kept aloof from the movement; but it was a man of very different mental calibre that was required to direct the revolution to a triumphant termination. But the conspirators were now overborne by the masses whom they had stirred into motion, and they had in their own ranks no man of commanding ability to preserve to them the direction of the movement.

General Chlopicki yielded to the popular voice, but, there seeming to be no fighting to be done, was at a loss for measures. He consulted Prince Lubecki, who was a member of the Viceroy's council, and a more able man, but too timid to benefit the movement by his counsels in such a crisis. The result of their consultation was a determination to proceed to the camp at Wierzbna, and endeavour to negotiate with the Viceroy. The Polish nobles in Warsaw assembled, and to them Prince Lubecki communicated his proposition, and the acquiescence therein of Chlopicki. It was agreed that Prince Adam Czartoryski, Count Ladislaus Ostrowski, and Professor Lelewel should, with Lubecki, constitute the deputation to wait upon the Viceroy. They went, and found Constantine in no humour to yield, though not in a position to resist. He consented to the withdrawal from the camp of the Polish brigades commanded by Generals Skrzynecki and Szembeck, and allowed Generals Zymirski and Krasinski to accompany them; but that was the utmost amount of concession that could be obtained from him. The deputation returned to Warsaw with the Polish troops, and Constantine led the Russian regiments towards the Niemen.

The Polish nobles, on receiving the report of the deputation, nominated a Provisional Government, consisting of its members, convened the Diet, and issued on the 10th of January, 1831, a manifesto which justified the revolution by showing the Constitution violated in numberless instances, not forgetting the reprimand administered to the Polish judges in 1826, and its safeguards gradually undermined and destroyed. "The union of the crown of an autocrat and of a constitutional king," said the manifesto, "is one of those political anomalies which cannot long exist. Everybody foresaw that the kingdom would become the germ of liberal institutions for Russia, or succumb under the iron hand of its despotism; the question was soon decided. Public instruction was corrupted; a system of obscurantism was organised; the people were shut out from all means of obtaining instruction; an entire palatinate was deprived of its representation in the Council; the Chambers lost the right of voting the Budget; new burdens were imposed; monopolies were created, calculated to dry up the sources of the national wealth; and the treasury, augmented by these measures, became the prey of venial hirelings, infamous incendiary agents, and despicable spies. Calumny and espionage penetrated even into the privacy of families; they infected with their poison the purity of domestic life, and the traditional hospitality of the Poles became a snare for innocence. Personal liberty, which had been solemnly guaranteed, was violated; the prisons were crowded; courts-martial were instituted to decide in civil cases, and imposed infamous punishments on citizens whose only crime was that of having attempted to save from corruption the spirit and the character of the nation."

About a week before the meeting of the Diet the Provisional Government surrendered its powers into the hands of Chlopicki, who, supported by the army and the populace of Warsaw, assumed a temporary dictatorship. The time was long enough, however, to enable him by the exercise of his power to close the clubs, repress the patriotic aspirations of the people, and send Prince Lubecki to St. Petersburg to renew with the Czar the negotiations which had failed in the camp of Constantine. The terms of accommodation which he proposed were the reunion of Lithuania, Volhynia, and Podolia with Poland, which had been promised by Alexander, the strict observance of the Constitution, and the withdrawal of the Russian garrisons. Nicholas peremptorily rejected them, and proceeded with his preparations for the conquest of the revolted kingdom.

The Diet met on the 19th, when Chlopicki resigned his powers into its hands, but resumed them, yielding to an almost unanimous resolution. He appointed to the Council of State, Prince Adam Czartoryski, Prince Radziwil, Count Ladislaus Ostrowski, General Dembrowski, the senator Kortellan, and the deputy Barzykowsky. The command of the army was offered to Chlopicki, but he refused it, and it was given, on his recommendation, to Prince Radziwil, a sound patriot, but timid and irresolute.

On the 25th a motion was made in the Diet by Soltyk, the historian, in favour of declaring Poland an independent State. It was opposed by Prince Czartoryski, whose aristocratic prejudices and recollections of Alexander's friendship biased him against the revolution, and the members seemed undecided.

They knew that great preparations were making in Russia for the invasion of their country, and they had begun to be doubtful of help from France. While they were in this wavering state of mind, Count Jezierski, who had accompanied Lubecki to St. Petersburg, rose to read a memorial which had been presented to the Czar on that occasion. Some insulting observations which Nicholas had written on the margin produced considerable agitation in the assembly, and when Count Anthony Ostrowski had supported the motion, and Leduchowski interrupted Count Walewski, who seemed about to reply to him, with a cry of "No more of Nicholas!" the cry was taken up on all sides, and, in the midst of intense excitement, the motion was carried. That night Warsaw was illuminated, and the patriotic fervour once more rose to enthusiasm.

Measures were taken immediately to resist Marshal Diebitsch, who had invaded Poland early in February with an army of one hundred and twenty thousand men and four hundred guns, but to oppose this force the Provisional Government could bring into the field only forty-five thousand men and a hundred and thirty guns. The Russians advanced rapidly, and on the 19th of February were in sight of Warsaw. Prince Radziwil marched the Polish army out of the city, and took up a strong position before the suburb of Praga, with the right wing resting on the Vistula and the marshes, and the left on a little elder wood that bordered the road along which the enemy had to pass. The Russians faced them, with their right extending to a range of hills, from which their batteries commanded the road and the wood, and their left resting on the Vistula and the marshes. As the enemy prepared to take up their position a brilliant attack was made by Zymirski and Szembeck, but they were ordered back by Chlopicki, who virtually commanded, under the nominal leadership of Prince Radziwil.

At daybreak on the following morning the Russians commenced the battle with a furious cannonade, under cover of which their infantry advanced in compact masses against the elder wood. The Poles stood firm, notwithstanding their inferiority in numbers, and the gloom of evening found them unbroken, though woefully diminished in numerical strength. Diebitsch abandoned the contest for a time, and on the following morning sent General Witt to demand a suspension of hostilities for three days. The armistice was refused, but the Poles were not in a position to assume the offensive, being short of ammunition as well as deficient in artillery, and three days passed in inaction. Prince Szacowski was marching with twenty-five thousand men to support Diebitsch, and General Jankowski was sent with two regiments of infantry and two of cavalry to intercept him. They met on the 24th, at Neporent, and, after a short skirmish, the Poles fell back upon Bialolenska, within three miles of Warsaw, where a sanguinary battle was fought, leaving the Russians in possession of the village.

On the following morning the fight was renewed at Bialolenska, where the brigade of General Krukowiecki attacked the Russians, and drove them back, with the loss of two thousand men and six guns. Diebitsch at the same time ordered a general attack, which was commenced as before with a heavy fire of shot and shell and a rush of infantry at the elder wood. The conflict was fierce and obstinate, the carnage horrible. Five times the Russians penetrated into the wood, and five times were they driven out again with fearful slaughter. Then, when the battle had lasted five hours, Zymirski was struck by a cannon ball, and his division fell into disorder. The enemy gained ground in the centre, but Chlopicki charged at the head of the Polish Grenadiers, and drove them back. He received a wound, however, and, being attacked by a superior force, fell back in turn, followed by the Russians.

Chlopicki saw that the battle would be lost if the enemy maintained their position in the centre, and thus interposed between the divisions of Skrzynecki and Szembeck. He ordered forward the former and a brigade of the latter, therefore, and with such effect was the charge delivered that the Russians were again forced back. At that critical moment, Chlopicki was struck by a cannon ball, and, as he was borne to the rear, Szachowskoi's corps came up, and the Russian cavalry charged the advancing battalions of Skrzynecki and Szembeck. Their first onset was resisted with heroic courage, but Szembeck was cut down by a cuirassier, and before the second charge the Poles fell back in confusion. The Russian cavalry pressed on, but the Polish cavalry met them, and, after a fierce conflict, the former were driven back upon Skrzynecki's infantry, and suffered immense loss before they could extricate themselves. The Poles rallied again, and being now joined by the division of Krukowiecki, the Russians began to waver. Skrzynecki proposed a general charge, but Prince Radziwil, who had already had the suburb of Praga fired to cover his retreat and uncover the guns on the ramparts of the city, considered the situation hopeless, and ordered a retreat.

The overflowing of the Vistula, consequent upon the melting of the snow, caused hostilities to be suspended for a month between the main bodies; but General Dwernicki, a commander of great energy and daring, kept the field with three thousand light cavalry, and defeated the Russians in several minor encounters. Among those who had the direction of the revolution, the question of superseding Prince Radziwil in the command of the army had become one of vital importance. The monarchical section supported the claim of Skrzynecki, who was also strongly recommended by Chlopicki; the republicans urged those of Dwernicki, who held their views, and had lately attracted attention by his exploits. The former was selected; he was brave, clever, and accomplished, but vain, ambitious, and profligate.

On the night of the 30th of March, Skrzynecki led the army out of the city so silently that the inhabitants were unaware of the movement, and crossed the bridge of Praga, upon which straw had been laid down, to prevent the sound of horses' hoofs and gun-wheels from reaching the ears of the enemy. Rybinski's division marched to Zornki, and by day-break was on the flank of the Russian division commanded by Geismar, which was encamped in a forest at the foot of the hills on their right. There they halted while Colonel Ramorino, an Italian officer, led his regiment, under the cover of a thick fog, to the rear of Geismar's position. When sufficient time had been allowed for this movement, Rybinski's artillery opened fire, and the enemy, surprised by the suddenness of the attack, fell into confusion. The Polish cavalry charged into the camp, and the Russians fled; but in the rear was Ramorino's regiment, which dashed at them with the bayonet, and killed or captured half the division. The remainder fell back in disorder upon the village of Dembewilkie, where General Rosen was posted with fifteen thousand men. That position was immediately charged by Skarzynski's brigade of cavalry, and the Russians fled along the road to Minsk, leaving two thousand of their number dead upon the field, and six thousand prisoners and twelve guns in the hands of the Poles, whose loss did not exceed three hundred.

Lubienski's brigade pursued the flying enemy, and chased them through Minsk, capturing many more. If Skrzynecki had taken full advantage of this complete victory, the results to the cause of Poland might have been immense; but he remained for some time inactive, while the enemy rallied, and the detached forces could gain only isolated victories, which diminished their strength while they added to their fame. Prondzynski attacked the Russians on the 10th of April at Iganie, and completely routed them, a whole brigade, the flower of the imperial infantry, called by Alexander the Lions of Varna, laying down their arms. On the 16th, Dwernicki encountered Rudiger's division at Brewel, and defeated it; but during the night of the 25th Rudiger crossed the Austrian frontier, and by that manœuvre, which was connived at by the Austrian Government, got into Dwernicki's rear with twenty-five thousand men. The Polish General attempted to extricate himself by a similar manœuvre, but his force had no sooner crossed the frontier than it was surrounded by an Austrian army, and compelled to surrender.

At length, on the 12th of May, Skrzynecki quitted his camp at Kaluzyn, leaving a small force under Uminski to mask his movement, and marched to Sierock, where he arrived on the 14th. Diebitsch was encamped on the opposite side of the Bug, and the Grand Duke Michael, with the infantry of the Imperial Guard, occupied the village of Lomza; while another Russian force, under Sacken, held the little town of Ostrolenka. As this last corps was isolated from the others, the numerical inferiority of the Poles should have dictated to Skrzynecki the policy of attacking the Grand Duke Michael with all his force, and endeavouring to drive him from his position before Diebitsch could cross the river with the main body. As great a blow might thus have been struck at the enemy as Rybinski had delivered on the 31st of March; and Sacken might have been dealt with afterwards, if he had ventured to remain in his position. Instead of adopting this course, Skrzynecki divided his forces into two—one, under Lubienski, to watch Diebitsch, and prevent him from crossing the river; the other, under his own direction, to attack the Grand Duke Michael at Lomza.

Having thus divided his forces, he made the further mistake of detaching a portion of his own command to attack Sacken at Ostrolenka. The result of this error was, that Sacken retired upon Lomza, and apprised the Grand Duke of the movement, while Diebitsch left his camp in haste, and crossed the Bug in force to assist in defeating it. Lubienski's division withstood the attack with courage and firmness until the evening, when, being almost surrounded by the enemy, they forced their way through at the point of the bayonet, and effected a junction with Skrzynecki during the darkness of the night. The latter, on hearing the roar of artillery near the river, had fallen back upon Ostrolenka, without venturing to attack the Grand Duke, and thus abandoned his enterprise without a blow.

Both armies concentrated themselves during the night, the Russians at Lomza, and the Poles at Ostrolenka; and, on the 26th, Diebitsch directed his entire force against Skrzynecki, subjecting the town to a hot bombardment as he advanced. The Poles fell back, and a furious conflict ensued in the streets of the town, amidst the blazing ruins of the houses fired by the shells. The carnage was terrible, the Poles contesting stubbornly every foot of ground, and yielding it only when overpowered by numbers. Seventeen thousand corpses, more than half of which were Russian, were heaped in the streets of Ostrolenka, when, as night fell upon the smoking ruins and the gory pavement, the Poles struggled out of the town, and began their retreat to Warsaw.

During the movements that followed this defeat, portions of the Polish army became separated from the main body, and forced into Lithuania, where their presence revived the insurrection which had taken place on the retreat of Constantine. General Janowski had been sent by the Provisional Government to support it, but he found himself confronted by a superior force of the enemy, and retreated. The appearance of Gielgud, Chlapowski, Dembinski, and Zalewski, with a considerable force, encouraged the Lithuanians so much that they were joined by twelve hundred young men, led by Prince Oginski, and three hundred students of the University of Wilna. Alarmed by this movement, which threatened his communications, Diebitsch detached Sacken to suppress it, and a large force was concentrated at Wilna for that purpose.

Seizing the opportunity afforded by the separation of Dembinski's division from the main body, Sacken attacked the Poles with a great force; and, though his left wing was repulsed by Zalewski, whose military qualities and patriotic zeal had gained for him rapid promotion, the centre and left of the Poles were defeated, and Gielgud ordered a retreat. Zalewski, having driven back the Russians, found himself alone on the field, and cut off from the main body; but he led his division in good order to Merez, crossed the Niemen, and took refuge in the forests of Augustow. Gielgud continued his retreat, leaving Dembinski and Zalewski to their fate, and, being closely pursued by Sacken, was forced upon Prussian territory, and obliged to surrender. He had been for some time suspected of lukewarmness in the national cause, and this disaster so exasperated his officers that one of them, named Skalski, shot him dead on the spot.

Dembinski, finding himself unable to maintain his position in Lithuania after the retreat of Gielgud, had, in the meantime, led his division southward, and reached Warsaw on the 3rd of August, having marched five hundred and fifty miles in twenty-five days, in which time he had crossed ten rivers, and preserved his corps intact. He entered Warsaw amidst enthusiastic acclamations, which were rendered all the more fervent by the contrast which his return afforded to the failures of Gielgud and Jankowski, and the blunders which had brought about the disastrous defeat of Ostrolenka. Both Skrzynecki and Jankowski had been received with cries of "Treachery!" and the popular excitement was so great that the Provisional Government deemed it expedient to appease it by ordering the latter's arrest. The monarchical party defeated, by a narrow majority, a resolution moved in the Diet declaring Skrzynecki unfit for the chief command of the army, but they could not prevent the appointment of a committee to inquire into the cause of his defeat. He thereupon resigned the command, and, on the popular excitement culminating in a tumult, during which the prisons were forced, and Jankowski and some Russian spies and Polish traitors hanged by the mob, his example was followed by the Provisional Government.

Their successors were chosen by the Diet from the Republican party, and they had in General Krukowiecki, the new President, a leader of great ability and energy. Dembinski, who belonged to the same party, was appointed to the command of the army, and a better selection could not have been made. On the 19th of August, three days after this change in the political situation, a council of war was held. Krukowiecki proposed to attack the Russians before the city; Dembinski, that the capital should be abandoned, and a rapid march made into Lithuania, to stir into a flame the smouldering embers of the extinguished revolt there; Uminski, that one half of the army should continue to hold Warsaw, while the remainder marched into Polachia, along the right bank of the Vistula, to procure supplies to enable them to withstand a siege. Of these plans, that of Krukowiecki has generally been regarded as the best, and it certainly presented the advantage of leaving Dembinski's open for adoption, in the event of defeat. Uminski's proposition found the largest amount of support, however, and half the army marched out under Ramorino, now a General. Krukowiecki resolved to embody the workmen, as a substitute for the strength thus lost, and Zalewski succeeded in organising an urban guard of twenty thousand men; but the monarchical party, by spreading the alarm of another tumult, procured their disbandment.

During the pause in the strife within the limits of Constantine's rule which followed the battle of Ostrolenka, both the Viceroy and Diebitsch died of cholera, and the latter was succeeded in the command of the Russian army by Marshal Paskewitch. The new commander determined to attack Warsaw on the south, and crossing the Vistula at Thorn, marched along its left bank.

On the 6th of September a general assault was made by the Russians, a hundred and twenty thousand strong, supported by the fire of two hundred guns. After some hard fighting, the assailants penetrated into the suburb of Wola, the Poles retiring before them in good order, and contesting every foot of ground as obstinately as they had done at Ostrolenka. As this success of the enemy was obviously the thin end of the wedge, a determined effort was made to recover the lost ground; but, after a sanguinary struggle, the Poles were again driven back, and the suburb remained during the night in the possession of the enemy. On the following morning Paskewitch summoned the defenders to make an unconditional surrender; and, on receiving a refusal, ordered the renewal of the assault, under the cover of a tremendous cannonade. The Poles resisted the attack with undiminished courage, and Krukowiecki, having recalled Ramorino, hoped to hold the Russians at bay until he should arrive. Even without Ramorino's aid, the result of the sanguinary conflict was for hours doubtful. The Polish cannon, ably directed by Soltyk, who showed himself on this occasion as admirable an artillery officer as he was a senator and a historian, and Bem, who had won his first laurels at Ostrolenka, made terrible havoc among the advancing columns of the assailants, and the infantry behaved with a gallantry which has never been surpassed. Gradually, however, the ramparts were stormed at every point, and at the close of the afternoon, when the city was burning on every side, and hundreds of houses were wrecked by the bursting of shells, while the Poles still fell back, overpowered by numbers, Krukowiecki capitulated, on the condition of the Polish troops being allowed to march out.

Five thousand of the defenders of Warsaw had been slain, however, and four thousand were prisoners. The Russian loss was officially stated at five thousand four hundred, but it is believed to have been much greater, some writers asserting it to have been nearer twenty thousand. General Malachowski marched to Modlin with the defenders of Warsaw, and, being joined by the garrison and many parties of fugitives, found himself, in a short time, at the head of twenty-seven thousand men. He had very little ammunition, however, and there was no other prospect than to surrender or die fighting. Dissensions broke out, and he resigned the command to Rybinski, who led the remnant of the Polish army across the frontier, and laid down their arms on Prussian territory rather than surrender to the Russians. Ramorino had already taken refuge in Austria, and the downfall of the hopes of Poland were complete.

Some of the leaders of the revolution were captured, and suffered on the scaffold, or were transported to the convict settlements in Siberia. Others escaped, and became scattered over the whole of Europe. Some of these located themselves in Paris and London, and earned a living as teachers of languages or music; many, destitute of all resources, were pensioned by the French Government, and had their abode fixed at Besançon. Others took up their abode at Geneva, and formed, a few years later, the nucleus of a new secret association with the same object as the Templars.

CHAPTER XII.

YOUNG ITALY.

WHILE the vibrations of the French Revolution were being felt throughout Europe, and the Carbonari were preparing for the insurrection in the Papal dominions, the mind of one of the noblest Italians that have ever lived, and whose name will go down to posterity with that of Cola di Rienzi, was occupied with the draft of another of those mysterious associations whose principles, aims, and actions I have undertaken to record. La Giovine Italia—Young Italy—sprang from the impression of the hopeless barrenness of Carbonarism which the past failures of that organisation had made upon the liberty-loving and humanity-loving heart of Giuseppe Mazzini, who had then little more than attained his majority.

This remarkable man, whose name is indelibly associated with the movement for achieving the independence of Italy, was born at Genoa in 1805. His father was a physician in considerable practice, and was regarded as one of the most eminent men of his profession of whom Italy could boast. He held a professorship in the University of Genoa, and was highly esteemed by the scientific men of his age and country. He does not seem to have entertained much active sympathy with his son's views, but he was tenderly attached to him by paternal impulse and affection. He died in 1848, leaving a widow who ardently admired her son's noble character, and shared with enthusiasm his political sentiments and aspirations.

Mazzini commenced his studies at the University of Genoa at the age of thirteen, and soon surprised every one about him, as much by the extreme generosity with which he bestowed his pocket-money, his books, and even his clothes, upon such of his fellow-students as needed them, as by the progress which he made in his studies. One of his fellow-students states that "he could never be made to observe the foolish forms and ceremonies prescribed to the students in those days, from an instinctive abhorrence of all merely arbitrary rule; neither threats nor the various modes of persecution adopted towards him by the professors could induce him to comply with these childish observances, and finally the professors themselves had to give way, and, respecting his moral character and his great talents, feign to be unconscious of his deficiencies in these respects." He was only sixteen years of age when an article from his pen appeared in the Antologia, a magazine published at Florence, which drew upon him the attention of the authorities, and marked him out for proscription at the first convenient opportunity. Even at that early age he began his life-long habit of wearing only black garments—"fancying myself in mourning for my country," as he used to say.

Leaving the University at the age of eighteen, he applied himself to the study of the law, with a view to the bar ; but literature and politics engrossed most of his attention even then, and all merely selfish considerations were as completely ignored as they were throughout his future life. His thoughts turning constantly upon the political condition of his country, he was induced to join the Carbonari, still directed by Buonarotti from his refuge in Geneva, but a mere shadow of what that organisation had once been.

“ I was conducted one evening,” says Mazzini, “ to a house near San Georgio, where, after ascending to the topmost storey, I found the person by whom I was to be initiated. This person was—as I afterwards learned—a certain Raimondo Doria, half Corsican, half Spaniard, a man advanced in years, and of a forbidding countenance. He informed me, with much solemnity, that the persecutions of the Government, and the caution and prudence required in order to reach the aim, rendered numerous assemblies impossible ; and that I should therefore be spared certain ordeals, ceremonies, and symbolical rites. He questioned me as to my readiness to act, and to obey the instructions which would be transmitted to me from time to time, and to sacrifice myself, if necessary, for the good of the Order. Then, after desiring me to kneel, he unsheathed a dagger, and recited the formula of oath administered to the initiated of the first or lowest rank, causing me to repeat it after him. He then communicated to me two or three signs by which to recognise the brethren, and dismissed me.”*

* Life and Writings of Joseph Mazzini.

He soon became dissatisfied with the connexion, deeming the aims of the Carbonari vague and indefinite, and their plans crude and ill-digested. The members had at that time to contribute five francs per month to the Carbonaro treasury, besides paying an entrance fee of twenty francs; and Mazzini saw that a barrier was thus raised against the admission of working men, and even, in many cases, of poor students like himself. He thought that the liberation of Italy must be the work of all, it having become evident that no aid was to be expected from France; and he found nothing talked of among the Carbonari but Lafayette and the Grand Lodge of Paris. He withdrew from them, therefore, and set himself the task of organising a new association which should be national in its scope, and aim at the unity of Italy as an independent democratic republic.

Before he had completed the details of his plan, however, he was arrested on the suspicion of being concerned in the movements of the Carbonari; and, though the charge was not substantiated, he was retained in custody, and, without being charged with any other offence, was kept in solitary confinement for six months in the fortress of Savona. On his liberation, he was ordered to leave Italy—in his own words, consigned to “the hell of exile—that lingering, bitter, agonising death, which none can know but the exile himself, that consumption of the soul which has but one hope to console it.” He removed to Marseilles, where he resumed his design, and formed the nucleus of a Society soon to be famous among the refugees from Modena, Parma, and the Romagna, who numbered about a thousand.

These refugees had already formed an association called the Apophasimenes, described by Mazzini as "a sort of military organisation—a complex mixture of oaths and symbols, with a multiplicity of grades and ranks, and an exaggeration of discipline calculated to destroy that enthusiasm of the heart which is the source of all great enterprises, and utterly devoid of any dominant moral principle." Mazzini would have nothing to do with this association, at the head of which was Carlo Bianco, under the superior direction of Buonarrotti. He argued that the Apophasimenes had either been concerned in the late insurrection, in which case they were all marked men or exiles; or they had stood aloof from it, which he contended was a sign of weakness. He resolved to proceed with his own design, trusting that he would be able to draw to him both the Apophasimenes and the Carbonari.

Having submitted a sketch of Young Italy to friends at Genoa, and received their approval, he drew up the statutes of the Society, commencing as follows:—

"Young Italy is a brotherhood of Italians who believe in a law of Progress and Duty, and are convinced that Italy is destined to become one nation—convinced also that she possesses sufficient strength within herself to become one, and that the ill-success of her former efforts is to be attributed, not to the weakness, but to the misdirection of the revolutionary elements within her—that the secret of force lies in constancy and unity of effort. They join this Association in the firm intent of consecrating both thought and action to the great aim of reconstituting Italy as one independent sovereign nation of free men and equals."

The third section declared the aim to be revolution, and the establishment of the unity of Italy under the Republican form of Government, resting on the widest basis. The fourth described the means by which this aim was to be accomplished.

"The means by which Young Italy proposes to reach its aim are—education and instruction, to be adopted simultaneously, and made to harmonise with each other. Education must ever be directed to teach by example, word, and pen, the necessity of insurrection. Insurrection, whenever it can be realised, must be so conducted as to render it a means of national education. Education, though of necessity secret in Italy, will be public out of Italy.

"The members of Young Italy will aid in collecting and maintaining a fund for the expenses of the printing and diffusion of the works of the Association. The mission of the Italian exiles is to constitute an apostolate. The instructions and intelligence indispensable as preparatory to action will be secret both in Italy and abroad.

"The character of the insurrection must be national; the programme of the insurrection must contain the germ of the programme of future Italian nationality. Wheresoever the initiative of insurrection shall take place, the flag raised and the aims proposed will be Italian. That aim being the formation of a nation, the insurrection will act in the name of the nation, and rely upon the people, hitherto neglected, for its support. That aim being the conquest of the whole of Italy, in whatever province the insurrection may arise, its operations with regard to other provinces will be conducted on a principle of invasion and expansion the most energetic and the broadest possible."

The organisation was simple, there being only two grades, the Initiated and the Initiators. The former were not allowed to affiliate, and only men of intelligence and prudence were admitted to the second grade. The contribution of members was fixed at fifty centimes per month. The central committee, sitting in Marseilles, or elsewhere beyond the Italian frontier, with Mazzini at the head, had the general direction of the movement; and the details were managed by local committees formed in the chief cities of Italy, assisted by a director of the Initiators. The groups of Initiated, each headed by an Initiator, were called congregations. The flag of the Society was the present Italian tricolour—red, white, and green, with the words Liberty, Equality, Humanity, on one side, and on the other Unity, Independence. The symbol was a branch of cypress, in memory of the martyrs of Italian liberty, with the motto, "Now and for ever." The oath taken by the members was as follows:—

"In the name of God and of Italy—in the name of all the martyrs of the holy Italian cause who have fallen beneath foreign and domestic tyranny—by the duties which bind me to the land wherein God has placed me, and to the brothers whom God has given me—by the love, innate in all men, I bear to the country that gave my mother birth, and will be the home of my children—by the hatred, innate in all men, I bear to evil, injustice, usurpation, and arbitrary rule—by the blush that rises to my brow when I stand before the citizens of other lands, to know that

I have no rights of citizenship, no country, and no national flag—by the aspiration that thrills my soul towards that liberty for which it was created, and is impotent to exert; towards the good it was created to strive after, and is impotent to achieve in the silence and isolation of slavery—by the memory of our former greatness and the sense of our present degradation—by the tears of Italian mothers for their sons dead on the scaffold, in prison, or in exile—by the sufferings of the millions—

“I, —— ——, believing in the mission entrusted by God to Italy, and the duty of every Italian to strive to attempt its fulfilment—convinced that where God has ordained that a nation shall be, he has given the requisite power to create it; that the people are the depositaries of that power, and that in its right direction, for the people, and by the people, lies the secret of victory—convinced that virtue consists in action and sacrifice, and strength in union and constancy of purpose—I give my name to Young Italy, an association of men holding the same faith, and swear—

“To dedicate myself wholly and for ever to the endeavour with them to constitute Italy one free, independent, Republican nation—to promote, by every means in my power, whether by written or spoken word, or by action, the education of my Italian brothers towards the aim of Young Italy; towards association, the sole means of its accomplishment; and to virtue, which alone can render the conquest lasting—to abstain from enrolling myself in any other association from this time forth—to obey all the instructions, in conformity with the spirit of Young

Italy, given me by those who represent with me the union of my Italian brothers, and to keep the secret of these instructions, even at the cost of my life—to assist my brothers of the Association both by action and counsel—

“NOW AND FÓR EVER !

“This do I swear, invoking upon my head the wrath of God, the abhorrence of man, and the infamy of the perjurer, if I ever betray the whole or a part of this my oath.”

Mazzini claimed for this Society that, by suppressing the condemnation to death pronounced by the Carbonari, and similar associations formed in Italy, by substituting the theory of duty for that of rights as its basis, by adopting a definite programme, and by repudiating foreign aid, it was separated from all anterior secret societies; and that by superseding “the tyranny of invisible chiefs, ignoble blind obedience, empty symbolism, multiple hierarchies, and the spirit of vengeance,” it “closed the period of political sects, and initiated that of educational associations.” He was himself the first to take the oath which he had formulated, and, having formed the nucleus of the Society among the refugees at Marseilles, sent the statutes to his friends, the brothers Ruffini at Genoa, and Guerazzi and Bini at Leghorn, with instructions for the propaganda, the spirit of which is sufficiently indicated by the following extracts :—

“You have to elevate a new banner, and you must seek its supporters among the young, who are capable of enthusiasm, energy, and sacrifice. Tell them the whole truth. Let them know all as to our aim and intent. We can then rely upon them, if they accept it. The great error of the past has been that of entrusting the fate of the country to individuals rather than to principles. Combat this error, and preach faith, not in names, but in the people, in our rights, and in God.

“Teach your followers that they must choose their leaders among men who seek their inspiration from revolution, not from the previous order of things. Lay bare all the errors committed in 1831, and do not conceal the faults of the leaders. Repeat incessantly that the salvation of Italy lies in her people. The lever of the people is action—continuous action; action ever renewed, without allowing one’s self to be overcome or disheartened by first defeats.

“Avoid compromises. They are almost always immoral, as well as dangerous.

“Do not deceive yourselves with any idea of the possibility of avoiding war, a war both bloody and inexorable with Austria. Seek rather, as soon as you feel you are strong enough, to promote it. Revolutionary war should always take the offensive. By being the first to attack, you inspire your enemies with terror, and your friends with courage and confidence.

“Hope nothing from foreign governments. They will never be really willing to aid you until you have shown that you are strong enough to conquer without them. Put no trust in diplomacy, but disconcert its intrigues by beginning the struggle, and by publicity in all things.

“Never rise in any other name than that of Italy, and of all Italy. If you gain your first battle in the name of a principle, and with your own forces alone, it will give you the position of initiators among the peoples, and you will have them for companions in the second. And should you fall, you will at least have helped to educate your countrymen, and leave behind you a programme to direct the generations to come."

The first congregations were formed at Genoa and Leghorn, but the organisation gradually spread all over the Peninsula. The correspondence passed from the Initiated to the Initiators, and through these to the local directors, who submitted it to the Italian committees, by whom it was forwarded to Mazzini. There were no signs of recognition adopted, they having been found dangerous; but a watchword, a piece of paper cut into a certain shape, and a peculiar grip, were used to accredit messengers between the central committee and the congregations. These were changed every three months.

A manifesto, setting forth the principles of the Association, was extensively circulated towards the close of 1831, and pioneered the journal La Giovine Italia, which became the organ of the new movement, and had able contributors in Mazzini, Gioberti, Guerazzi, Campanella, and others. The contributions and the sale paid the expenses. Mazzini was the editor, Cecilia worked upon the paper as a compositor, Lamberti corrected the proofs, another refugee acted as porter—all giving their services gratuitously. Some sailors on the steamers running between Marseilles and Genoa, Leghorn and Civita Vecchia, and the agent of the company owning the Neapolitan steamers, conveyed the journals and pamphlets of the Society; those intended for Genoa being sent to an unsuspected commercial firm at Leghorn; those for Leghorn, to a house of like repute at Civita Vecchia; and so on. By this means the scrutiny of the police and customs' officers was avoided at the port first touched at, the packet remaining in the charge of the person to whom it was entrusted until a correspondent of Mazzini's, who expected it, went aboard and landed it, concealed about his person.

When the existence of the Society came to be suspected—when searches were made for its publications, and the Piedmontese Government offered rewards for the discovery of the authors, and decreed the penalty of two years' imprisonment and a heavy fine for non-denunciation, the papers were sent in barrels of pumice-stone, or any other light and cheap commodity, which were filled in a warehouse hired for the purpose, and consigned to traders in the Italian ports, who were ignorant of their contents, by commission agents who were equally in the dark. Initiators, apprised of their despatch, waited upon the consignees, selected for purchase the barrels indicated by a number which had been communicated to them, and which alone contained the papers.

The congregations of Young Italy multiplied rapidly, especially in Lombardy, Tuscany, and the Papal States. Messengers were constantly passing between the central committee and the local committees in Italy, and secret and secure means of communication were found even in the Neapolitan provinces. The demand for La Giovine Italia was ever increasing, and all who read were initiated. Secret presses were set up at Genoa and Leghorn to reproduce it, and to print pamphlets and hand-bills inspired by local circumstances. In less than a year Young Italy was the dominant Society of the Peninsula.

The attention of the French Government was drawn at length to the work of Mazzini and his friends; and in August, 1832, he was ordered to quit France. Residence at Marseilles being important to the apostolate, he concealed himself, and for more than a year evaded the search of the police, living all that time in one room, incessantly occupied in writing, correcting proofs, correspondence, and midnight interviews with friends from Italy and the leading French republicans, notably Armand Carrel, Godefroi Cavaignac, and Armand Marrast. Victor Vian became the ostensible editor of the journal; and when the prefect of Marseilles threatened with expulsion those whom the police suspected of being the contributors and compositors, the contributors distributed themselves among the neighbouring villages, and the Italian compositors were succeeded by Frenchmen. The spies of the prefect became the spies of Mazzini, and kept him constantly informed of the measures to be adopted for his discovery; and when his retreat was at length discovered, an individual who resembled him was substituted for him, and proceeded to the frontier with an escort of gendarmes; while Mazzini returned to his lodging in the uniform of a National Guard.

While the chief of Young Italy was in concealment at Marseilles, one Emiliani, formerly groom of the Duke of Modena, and then acting as a spy of that sovereign, was attacked at Rhodéz by some Italian refugees; and about six months afterwards he and a fellow spy named Lazzareschi were mortally wounded in a café by an Italian refugee named Gavioli. There is no doubt that the crime was committed from political motives, or from the feeling that the safety of the refugees was endangered by the presence of the victims in that neighbourhood; but the Moniteur went beyond this reasonable surmise, and announced that the victims had been condemned by a secret and unlawful tribunal, of which Mazzini had been president, and Cecilia secretary. It even published what was alleged to be a copy of the judgment, with those names attached. Mazzini protested in the Tribune against this statement, and challenged the authors of the calumny to produce the original document. They could not produce it, and they were silenced; but Gisquet, then prefect of police, revived the calumny in his "Mémoires," published in 1840. Mazzini prosecuted him, and obtained a judgment. But Sir James Graham did not hesitate, five years afterwards, to repeat the foul story, for which he found it necessary to apologise in the House of Commons, and to acknowledge that he had ascertained that no evidence existed that could inculpate Mazzini.

About the time of the murder of Emiliani and Lazzareschi, some amendments were made in the statutes of the Association. Every member received a nom du guerre, in order the better to avoid detection by the police; that of Garibaldi was Borel. The contribution was required to be according to the member's circumstances; and the committee had power given them to grant exemptions in the case of those who were too poor to contribute to the fund. Every member was required, however, to provide himself with a musket and fifty rounds of ammunition. A sign was adopted for use by all the members, and changed every three months, or oftener, if an earlier change was deemed necessary.

The society of the Apophasimenes merged at this time in Young Italy, and Carlo Bianco joined the central committee. The weak and isolated lodges of Italian Carbonari adopted its creed; and Buonarotti entered into friendly correspondence with Mazzini for the furtherance of their common object. The Society now numbered among its members Depretis, Pareto, and Bastogi, afterwards Ministers; Matteuci, since a senator; Cempini, son of the Minister of that name; the Marquis of Roveredo, Professor Corsini, and the advocate Azario. It had grown so strong that the time seemed to have come when the thought of all might be allowed to find expression in deeds.

After much anxious consideration of the matter, it was resolved that the movement should commence at Genoa and Alessandria, and that the refugees should then enter Savoy, in order to divide the forces of the enemy, and establish communication with the French republicans, who were then organising a revolt in Lyons. The Piedmontese army was sounded; the superior officers stood aloof, but the subalterns were found ready, the Society having members in nearly every regiment, and centres of action in some of the garrisons, especially in the artillery corps of Genoa and Alessandria. General Giffenga promised his support in the event of the revolt showing strength; and no doubt was felt that the whole army would be guided by the same rule. In the event of success, a Provisional Government was to be formed by the delegation of a member from each of the local committees; and when the Austrians had been expelled, a Parliament was to be convened in Rome, to frame a Constitution for the whole of Italy.

While this plot was maturing, the Piedmontese Government, having become aware of the existence of a formidable secret society, was making great efforts to discover it; but misled by reliance on the experience of 1821, was searching for it where it was not to be found. The pursuit of political amelioration begins with the upper classes, and is continued downward with the diffusion of education; hence the movement that had a dozen years before been one of the aristocracy was now popular. Marquises and Counts were much fewer in the ranks of Young Italy than in those of the Carbonari; and the police did not seek for traces of the plot where they were most likely to be found. It happened, however, that one Miglio, a sergeant of sappers, had a quarrel with a comrade about a woman; swords were drawn, and they were put under arrest. Some threatening words uttered by one of the rivals created suspicion; a search was made, and some torn pamphlets and a list of names were found.

This discovery gave the police a clue to the plot; and the number of arrests that followed created general consternation. Nobles, officers of the army, members of the learned professions, shopkeepers, artisans, soldiers, crowded the prisons of Genoa, Alessandria, Turin, and Chambery. Every artifice was resorted to by the authorities for the purpose of obtaining disclosures. A man was introduced into Miglio's cell, who pretended to be in the plot, and to have means of secret communication. The unsuspecting sergeant gave him a letter to a relative, which was immediately handed to the police, and produced on his trial as evidence against him.* The mothers, wives, and sisters of prisoners were induced to exhort them to make disclosures, in the hope of saving their lives. Pretended confessions were paraded before them, and allegations made of arrests and executions which had not taken place, with the view of extorting revelations from their fears.

Mazzini, on hearing of these arrests, wrote immediately to Jacopo Ruffini: "Act at once, if possible; if not, you are lost." Ruffini and his associates in the plot hesitated. The Government had not discovered much; precautions had been adopted, such as excluding civilians from the barracks; if the movement failed, they might be supposed to have given the signal hastily, in the hope of saving themselves. The official gazette of Turin was alarming the public mind by false reports of mines discovered under magazines of ammunition, poison found in the rooms of the arrested officers, and a plot to burn the capital. Nothing was attempted. Executions followed the arrests on a scale that testified to the fears of Charles Albert and his Ministers. The first who suffered was Captain Tamburelli, who was executed at Chambery on the 22nd of May; the next was Lieutenant Tola, at the same place, on the 11th of June; three days later five sergeants suffered the extreme penalty at Alessandria, and another at Chambery; on the following day, a fencing-master, named Gavotta, and a sergeant of grenadiers were executed at Genoa; finally, on the 22nd, Vocchieri, a lawyer, was executed at Alessandria.

These eleven executions were far from having emptied the prisons. Two more of the accused, Noli and Moja, who belonged to the trading class, were condemned to imprisonment for life; Dr. Orsini, Lieutenant Thappuz, and Lupo, a jeweller, to twenty years' imprisonment; General Guillot to ten years, and many more to periods of imprisonment ranging from two to five years. The Marquises of Spinola and Durazzo, and Count Cambiasis were liberated; Jacopo Ruffini committed suicide by opening a vein in his neck with a nail; the Marquises of Roveredo and Cattaneo, the landowner Gentilini, the advocates Scovazzi and Berghini, the surgeon Scotti, Giovanni Ruffini, Colonel Berberis, Lieutenants Ardoino and Vaccarezza, and four sergeants escaped to swell the ranks of the refugees, but, together with Mazzini, had sentence of death pronounced against them in their absence.

Notwithstanding these severities, and the dispersion of those who avoided arrest, another attempt at insurrection was made at Genoa before the end of the year, but failed; a result which was attributed by Mazzini to the youth and inexperience of the leaders. Garibaldi was implicated in this affair, and had, in consequence, to leave Italy; and Mazzini, finding his position at Marseilles no longer tenable, removed to Geneva, where he had already cultivated friendly relations with Jacques Fazy, the leader of the democratic party in that city. Celeste Menotti, brother of the Modenese Minister, Agostino, and Giambattista

Ruffini, Nicolo Fabrizi, Giuseppe Lamberti, and other refugees were resident in Geneva; and Bianco, Gentilini, Scovazzi, and others at Nyon. An insurrection in Savoy, with the view of uniting that province to Switzerland, was planned, with the complicity of many of the citizens of Chambery, Annecy, Thonon, Bonneville, Evain, and other towns, and with an ulterior view to a similar movement in the Tyrol, the whole design having for its object the interposition of a neutral territory along the whole frontier of Italy, as a barrier against France and Austria.

General Ramorino, who had acquired some distinction while serving with the Polish army of independence during the preceding year, was at this time the idol of the Italians, who fondly believed that they beheld in him the future deliverer of their country from the domination of Austria. He was warmly recommended to Mazzini by the committees, and by the wealthy patriots who furnished the funds by which the movement was to be sustained; and the chief, though he felt doubtful of Ramorino, hesitated to reject him, lest he should be suspected of jealousy. He had his character studied by two agents whom he deemed trustworthy, therefore; and, their reports being satisfactory, he invited Ramorino to join him at Geneva. A plan was concerted between them for an expedition into Savoy in two columns, one of which was to start from Lyons, and the other from Geneva. It was arranged that Ramorino should lead the former, and he received a sum of forty thousand francs for expenses, and set out for Lyons, accompanied by a young man, recommended to him by Mazzini as a secretary, but who served the latter also as a spy upon the General.

The activity of Mazzini at this time was wonderful. He bought arms at St. Etienne and Liège, corresponded with Polish and German refugees at Berne and Zurich, enrolled new members, and urged the Carbonari of France to attempt a diversion. But Buonarotti opposed the enterprise, and, if there was no jealousy between the two associations, there was certainly no co-operation. Buonarotti did not yield to Mazzini in his love of their country, but they differed as to the means as much as to the end. "All Mazzini's companions," says M. Louis Blanc, "were not influenced by the same holy belief, and the same love of humanity as himself. Buonarotti thought that truth ought to have defenders worthy of her, and that they alone are worthy to serve the people who honour them by their virtue." But when was a revolution accomplished solely by virtuous and purely disinterested men? Buonarotti waited for such, and he waited in vain; he might as well have expected an intervention of angels.

Ramorino proceeded from Lyons to Paris, and from that city reported to Mazzini unexpected obstacles. A month, two months, three months passed away, and Mazzini became impatient. Secret agents of the police had presented themselves in Geneva, and the refugees were eager to set out for the frontier. There was, just before this time, a number of Polish refugees resident at Besançon, and subsisting upon allowances made to them by the French Government and the benevolence of the French Liberals. The support of these men to the cause of Italian independence had been secured, and they had left Besançon for the purpose of fulfilling their engagements. The Government of Louis Philippe, established under the sanction of the Holy Alliance, had no intention of aiding the revolution, either in Poland or Italy; and the Soult-Thiers Ministry manifested a great desire for the return of the Polish refugees to Besançon, making them liberal offers to induce them to abandon an undertaking with which the Ministers of Louis Philippe were probably well acquainted.

Ramorino, importuned at the beginning of 1834 by the emissaries of Mazzini, confessed that nothing had been prepared at Lyons, and returned ten thousand francs out of the forty thousand which he had received for the purposes of the expedition. More than ever uneasy concerning the General, and anxious for the enterprise which Ramorino's procrastination was endangering, Mazzini made the final arrangements for the expedition, and summoned the military leader to Geneva. Ramorino should have reached that city on the 20th of January; he did not arrive until the evening of the 31st. The conference which he then had with his political chief was not a pleasant one. The presentiment of a coming danger cast a gloom over both; Mazzini suspected Ramorino, who feared that his treachery had been discovered.

The affiliated of Savoy were assembled at St. Julien, and Mazzini proposed that they should commence the enterprise by seizing that town, judging that he could defeat the machinations of Ramorino, if he were really as treacherous as he was suspected of being, when once the expedition was fairly launched, and a blow had been struck. Ramorino assented, and it was arranged that the refugees should move towards the frontier in two bodies, one of which was to start from Geneva, under the direction of the General, and the other to cross the lake from Nyon, where the arms and ammunition were stored, under the leadership of a Pole named Grabski, a brave man, but without much experience in war. Mazzini was to accompany the column from Geneva, which was to direct its course to Carouge, on the frontier, and be joined by the other on the road to St. Julien.

The authorities of Geneva were not unaware of the movement that was contemplated, and they adopted measures for its frustration. When the time came for the departure of the refugees, the militia were under arms, gendarmes posted at the gates, and the ferry-boats under an embargo. The sympathies of the inhabitants and the militia were so unmistakably manifested for the refugees, however, that the magistrates found it advisable to abandon their purpose at the eleventh hour, and allow the pioneers of Italian liberty to depart. Grabski's party left Nyon at the same time with the arms and ammunition; but the attention of the authorities had been drawn to the movement by the foolishness of the German refugees, who started in large parties, wearing cockades of the German tricolour, and they were overtaken before the lake was crossed, the arms seized, and the men forced to return.

Mazzini's suspicions of Ramorino were confirmed by his conduct after leaving Geneva. Instead of marching upon St. Julien, he led his column along the southern shore of the lake, and answered evasively the questions of Mazzini as to their destination, and the reasons for the change of route. Bad weather, fatigue, anxiety, and sleepless nights threw Mazzini into a fever, and he was sent back to Geneva in a peasant's cart. The refugees began to murmur. Ramorino then told them plainly that they were engaged in a mad and useless undertaking, and that the best thing they could do was to return to Switzerland.

This affair caused the foreign refugees to be expelled from Switzerland, and most of them took refuge in France. Mazzini left Geneva as soon as he was sufficiently recovered, and, accompanied by the Ruffinis, proceeded to Lausanne, where they remained concealed for a time, and then were accorded permission to reside at Berne. The Savoy expedition caused many of Mazzini's friends to secede from Young Italy, and their defection was severely felt by him. He occupied himself, however, with the organisation of Young Europe, without losing sight of his Italian schemes, which, for a time, remained in abeyance. Having drawn upon himself the attention of the Austrian, Prussian, and Russian Governments by his connexion with the German and Polish refugees in Switzerland, the Federal Government, in August, 1836, ordered his expulsion, and, after hiding until December to evade compliance, he removed to London.

"During those fatal months," he says, "there darkened around me such a hurricane of sorrow, disillusion, and deception, as to bring before my eyes, in all its ghastly nakedness, a foreshadowing of the old age of my soul, solitary, in a desert world, wherein no comfort in the struggle was vouchsafed to me. It was not only the overthrow, for an indefinite period, of every Italian hope, it was the falling to pieces of that moral edifice of faith and love from which alone I had derived strength for the combat—the scepticism I saw rising around me on every side—the failure of faith in those who had solemnly bound themselves with me to pursue unshaken the path we had known from the outset to be choked with sorrows—the distrust I detected in those most dear to me, as to the motives and intentions which sustained and urged me onward in the evidently unequal struggle.”

In that moral desert, doubt came upon him. What if, after all, he was wrong—if he was pursuing a chimera? “The day on which my soul was furrowed by these doubts,” he continues, “I felt myself not only unutterably and supremely wretched, but a criminal, conscious of guilt, yet incapable of expiation. How many mothers had I caused to weep! How many more must weep should I persist in the attempt to rouse the youth of Italy to noble action, to awaken in them the yearning for a common country! And if that country were indeed an illusion—if Italy, exhausted by two epochs of civilisation, were condemned by Providence henceforth to remain subject to younger and more vigorous nations, without a name or a mission of her own—whence had I derived the right of judging the future, and urging hundreds, thousands of men to the sacrifice of themselves, and of all that they held most dear?”

While oppressed by these terrible thoughts, he heard a friend, whose room was near his own, observe to a young girl who, having some suspicion of his unhappy condition, was urging her companion to break in upon his solitude, "Leave him alone; he is in his element—conspiring—and happy." If a friend could so misjudge him, what must be the judgment of the world? He struggled out of the depth of doubt and despondency into which he had been plunged, however, and advanced, as he says, "from the conception of progress to a true conception of life, to faith in a mission and its logical consequence, duty, the supreme rule of life; and, having reached that faith, I swore to myself that nothing in this world should again make me doubt or forsake it."

He was at this time in extreme poverty, often pawning his clothes to procure a meal; and at length having recourse to loan offices, his better situated countrymen in London becoming his security. After a time his literary labours procured him an income more than sufficient for his wants, as well as the friendship of many men of political and literary renown. His mode of living during his prolonged sojourn in London was quiet and unostentatious, and his manners are described by those who knew him well as mild and urbane. He was benevolent to a degree which many thought Quixotic; still, as in his youth, parting with his clothes to his poorer compatriots, and often taking everything of value that he possessed to the pawnbrokers to provide the means of helping his friends, or to replace the money required for his own wants, and which previous charities had absorbed. He set on foot a school for the education of the poor Italian boys who used to perambulate the streets of the metropolis, and exerted himself in other ways, and with some success, to ameliorate their condition.

In 1844 the shocking affair of the brothers Bandiera occurred. These unfortunate young men were the sons of Baron Bandiera, who held the rank of rear-admiral in the Austrian service, and in that capacity had offended his countrymen by seizing the insurgents who fled from Ancona by sea on the collapse of the rising of 1831. Attilio Bandiera, the elder brother, opened a correspondence with Mazzini in 1842, expressing the most earnest devotion to the cause of Italian independence; and in the following year, when the national aspirations again fermented, the Bandieras began to concert a revolt, and, being betrayed by one Micciarelli, fled to Corfu. There they were joined by Domenico Moro, a lieutenant in the Austrian navy, and several others; and, being cited to appear at Venice, to answer the charge of treason in having joined Young Italy, they disobeyed the citation.

Ricciotti, who had been a Carbonaro, and had served in Spain under Riego, was on his way to Italy at this time, but was arrested at Marseilles, and not allowed to proceed. He came to London, therefore, and was supplied by the Italian refugees with funds for the purpose of a descent upon Ancona, in conjunction with the refugees in Corfu. The original intention of the latter had been to disembark on the coast of Calabria, but Fabrizi, then a refugee at Malta, advised that nothing should be done without the concurrence of Mazzini, and that their enterprise should be part of a comprehensive plan of insurrection, dependent upon a movement in the interior. On the 11th of June, however, Emilio Bandiera wrote to Mazzini that no means of reaching Ancona could be found, and that they had received good news from Calabria, which had determined them to proceed to the south.

The good news to which he referred was a communication made to the refugees by the master of a coasting vessel that two thousand insurgents were awaiting a chief in the forests of Calabria. A Calabrian brigand, who had been hunted from the country, volunteered to be their guide; and the master of a vessel which opportunely arrived offered to convey them to the coast of Calabria for a very small sum. The fact that Mazzini's correspondence had been tampered with in the London General Post-office, and the contents communicated by the British Government to the Austrian Ambassador, renders it probable that Mazzini was not far wrong in his assertion that the "good news" relied upon by the Bandieras was concocted for the purpose of luring the refugees to the Italian coast, and the guide and the vessel furnished for the purpose of facilitating their doomed enterprise. The Bandieras, Ricciotti, Moro, and fifteen others embarked on the night of the 12th and landed at Cosenza, where one of the party, named Boccheciampi, disappeared. They pushed into the interior, wandering about for five days, seeking an insurgent band that had no existence, and then were surrounded by an overwhelming force, and all killed or taken prisoners.

The latter were examined before a military commission, together with Boccheciampi, who was accused of treason in failing to reveal the plot, but was regarded by his companions as a traitor. On the 25th of July nine of the prisoners, including the Bandieras, Moro, and Ricciotti, were shot, crying Viva l'Italia! with their last breath. Numerous arrests were made in connexion with this affair, and Count Felice Orsini and many others were condemned to imprisonment for life, but pardoned a few years afterwards.

No failures disheartened Mazzini, however, and before the end of 1846 arrangements were again in progress for an insurrection throughout the Peninsula. Symptoms of agitation became perceptible in the summer of 1847, and on the 10th of August a body of Austrian troops crossed the Po and occupied Ferrara, not without a protest on the part of the Pope, which, as it was not followed by such measures as would have been adopted against a revolutionary movement, cannot be regarded as conceived in a patriotic spirit. Great excitement was produced by this measure throughout Italy, and towards the close of the year Modena and Reggio became so much agitated that the Duke of Modena invited the Austrian Government to occupy his dominions. The popular excitement was increased by these measures, and on the 1st of January, 1848, the Pope's carriage was surrounded by a crowd, and the Italian tricolour waved over his head.

Two days later crowds assembled in the streets of Genoa, and a meeting was held, at which a petition for reforms in the administration was adopted. On the same day a similar manifestation was made at Venice, where the bold language used by Tommasio, an eminent member of the literary profession, and Manin, a very popular advocate, caused their arrest. On the 6th the movement spread to Leghorn, where it took the form of a demand for the institution of a civic guard, which was acceded to by the Grand Duke of Tuscany, and the command conferred on Guerazzi, who had been the chief advocate of the measure.

These symptoms of a revolutionary spirit alarmed the Italian Governments, and they bowed before the movement, the King of the Sicilies taking the lead in granting a constitution to his subjects. The example was followed by the Grand Duke of Tuscany; and the Pope appointed a commission to consider the extent to which representative institutions would be compatible with ecclesiastical government. This was the state of affairs when the news of the French Revolution electrified Europe, and startled the Italian potentates into quicker action. Pius IX. dismissed his ministers, promised a constitution, and called to his councils ten laymen and only three priests.

On the 16th of March, the popular agitation in Venice, which had not ceased, culminated in a tumult which assumed an aspect so serious that General Palfy judged it prudent to release Manin and Tommasio, and permit the formation of a civic guard. He then resigned, and was succeeded by Count Zichy, who surrendered the guns and ammunition in the forts, and permitted all the Italian soldiers to leave the army. He then withdrew, with the Austrian troops, to Trieste; and the Venetians instituted a Provisional Government, at the head of which was Manin. Two days afterwards Milan was in revolt, five thousand Italian soldiers joining their countrymen, and as many more coming from Pavia, Brescia, and other towns during the six days of conflict that terminated with the defeat of the Austrians, their withdrawal to Crema, and the establishment of a Provisional Government.

These successes produced immense enthusiasm throughout Italy, and the revolt spread rapidly to all the towns of the Lombardo-Venetian vice-royalty, the Italian soldiers in the Austrian army everywhere deserting the imperial colours and joining their compatriots. The fortress of Rocco d'Anio was seized by the insurgents, the Italian regiments forming the garrison of Palma Nuova surrendered that stronghold to them, and the Austrian troops in Padua abandoned the city to aid in the defence of Verona, to which place Marshal Radetzky had retired from Crema.

The Piedmontese were so much excited by the success of the revolt in Lombardy, that it became obvious to Charles Albert that he had to choose between war with Austria and revolution at Turin. In the first days of the struggle at Milan he hesitated, gave orders to arrest the march of the volunteers hastening from Piedmont to aid the Lombards,* and refused an audience to Count Arèse, who had been sent from Milan by Mazzini, and was coldly received by the Turin Cabinet. On the 21st, when the reports from Milan were more favourable to the insurgents, he sent Count Martini to offer them aid on the condition of the incorporation of Lombardy with Piedmont. On the following day he assured Count Buol, through Count Ficquelmont, that he desired to second him in everything that could cement the relations of amity and good neighbourhood between Piedmont and Austria; and on the 23rd, when the revolution at Milan was complete, he declared war.

This course, which would have been merely politic in a foreign Government, was unpatriotic and selfish in an Italian ruler. His policy was directed primarily to the preservation of his throne by seeming to swim with the popular current, and secondarily to the acquisition of Lombardy as a part of his dominions; not to the independence of Italy. This is proved by the Marquis of Pareto's despatch of the 23rd to Mr. Abercrombie, the British Minister in Turin,* stating that the King had declared war in order to avert a revolution; and by the statement made to the Marquis of Normanby by the Marquis of Bignole, the Piedmontese Ambassador in Paris, that the King had commenced hostilities only for the purpose of maintaining order in a territory left by the force of circumstances without a master.

Mazzini had contrived to reach Milan, and was in constant communication with the Provisional Government established there; but a number of Italian refugees from London and Paris were detained and disarmed by the authorities on their arrival at Genoa. Charles Albert and the Provisional Government of Lombardy were not looking to the same end. "Our position as a Provisional Government," said the latter, in a despatch sent to the Piedmontese Government on the 23rd, "does not allow us to anticipate the votes of the nation, which undoubtedly is entirely in favour of a greater strengthening of Italian unity." But this spirit was not persisted in, and hence the differences which soon began to arise between the Provisional Government and the chief of Young Italy.

Mazzini would have had the revolution made by and for the people, and would have refused the aid of Charles Albert, except on the condition of the aim of the war being nothing less than the complete independence and unity of Italy. The Provisional Government preferred the aid of the Piedmontese army to that of untrained volunteers, even though the price should be the sacrifice of the grander aim of Young Italy.* When Mazzini urged that the volunteers might have experienced leaders in the refugees who had served in Spain, in Greece, and in Poland, Collegno, the Minister of War, said that nobody knew where to find them. Mazzini replied that he could produce them, and Collegno, after some hesitation, authorised him to summon them; but when they came, their services were refused, and those of Piedmontese officers accepted instead.

Campanella, an old friend of Mazzini's, shortly afterwards had an interview with Castagneto, the King's secretary, who proposed, on behalf of Charles Albert, that Mazzini should bring over the Republicans to the cause of the monarchy, and in return should be allowed as much influence as he could desire in framing a new Constitution. Mazzini declined, however, except on the condition of Charles Albert's declaration for the unity and independence of Italy; and, on being asked what guarantee he required for the King's concurrence in that aim, he proposed that the royal signature should be given to a few lines to that effect, which, at Castagneto's request, he wrote as follows :—

“I feel that the time is ripe for the unity of our country. My soul thrills in response to yours. Up! arise! I will be your leader. I offer you, as the gage of my good faith, the spectacle hitherto unknown to the world of a King constituting himself the priest of a new epoch, the armed apostle of the popular idea, the architect of the temple of the nation. In the name of God and of Italy, I tear to shreds the ancient treaties which held you dismembered—treaties heavy with your blood. I call upon you to overthrow the barriers which still divide you, and to group yourselves in legions of free brothers, around me, your leader, ready to conquer or to die with you.”

A few days afterwards, he was shown a letter in which Castagneto said—“I see plainly that nothing is to be done in that quarter.” The war became, therefore, on the part of Charles Albert, not a war for the independence of Italy, but a war for the incorporation of Lombardy with Piedmont.

The popular excitement, intensified by Charles Albert's declaration of war, and the entrance of Piedmontese troops into Lombardy, obliged the Italian sovereigns to adopt so much of the programme of Young Italy as related to the national independence. The Pope at first resisted the demand for war, but bands of volunteers crossed the Po, and the excitement in Rome became so great that he at length yielded, and sent to the frontier seven thousand native infantry, four battalions of Swiss, a regiment of cavalry, and two batteries of artillery, under the command of General Durando. From Tuscany, Parma, and Modena there was a rush of volunteers to the Mincio, the Grand Duchy furnishing four thousand, Parma one thousand and a battery of artillery, and Modena fifteen hundred.

On the 29th of March, General Pepe arrived at Naples, and was sent for by the King, who accorded him a gracious reception. The veteran Carbonaro urged Ferdinand to grant a more liberal Constitution, and on the following day the King dismissed his Ministers, and invited Pepe to form a Ministry, of which he should have the Presidency, with the Ministries of War and Marine.* Pepe would accept office, however, only on the condition that the King would consent to extend the franchise, convoke a new Assembly, give the deputies larger powers of legislation, introduce various administrative reforms, give the National Guards the charge of the forts, and send an army at once against the Austrians. Ferdinand refused, but, finding it impracticable to obtain a Ministry without Pepe, he accepted the last stipulation, and gave him the command. Every difficulty was thrown, however, in the way of the expedition, the Naval Department insisting that the fleet could not convey troops, the King interposing various delays, and the Pope refusing permission for more than one battalion or squadron to pass daily. Seventeen thousand troops at last started, but with orders not to cross the Po until the King commanded the passage!

* Pepe's Events in Italy in 1847-48.

The Neapolitan Assembly did not meet until after the departure of the troops, and the treachery of the King was immediately seen. Though the Constitution gave the Assembly power to revise it, he insisted that the deputies should swear to maintain it as it then stood, and this demand was resisted by the Liberals, supported by a formidable demonstration of the National Guards. On the second day of the debate barricades were erected in the streets, and the aspect of affairs became so threatening that Ferdinand yielded, or rather appeared to yield; for the accidental or intentional discharge of a musket provoked a conflict between the Swiss Guards and the Nationals, and, the latter being defeated, after a sanguinary contest of eight hours, he dissolved the Assembly, disbanded the National Guard, proclaimed martial law, and allowed the lazzaroni to pillage and burn the houses of the Liberals, without any attempt to preserve order.

Four thousand Lombard volunteers had in the meantime left Brescia, under the command of Allemandi, and passed the Alps, with the aim of cutting off the communications of the Austrian army. Charles Albert was asked to furnish two battalions and a couple of guns for this expedition, but he refused. In a few days, however, the volunteers were in possession of all the passes between Cler and Garda, and the roads between Trent and the Alps. General Welden marched against them from Trent, overcame the resistance of their undisciplined valour, and forced them back into Lombardy. The garrisons of Brescia, Monza, and Como had now surrendered to the insurgents, however, and Pavia had been evacuated; and the Piedmontese, after repulsing the Austrians at Goito and Pastrengo, invested Mantua and Peschiera, the enemy retiring behind the Adige.

The Neapolitan army had in the meantime reached Bologna, where Pepe received a letter from Manin, begging him to hasten to Venice. Before he could advance, however, General Statella arrived, bringing orders from the Prince of Inchilterra, the Minister of War, for the troops to return, and superseding Pepe in the event of his refusal to obey. Pepe resigned the command, but so much excitement was created by the recall, both among the troops and the Bolognese, that he revoked his resignation, and sent orders for the regiments at Ferrara to remain, and those at Ancona to hasten to Bologna. His final decision gave great satisfaction to the Bolognese, who celebrated it with a torchlight procession, with banners, and bands playing patriotic airs. Statella returned to Naples, bearing letters from Pepe to the King and the Prince of Inchilterra, in which he declared his firm resolution not to send, much less to reconduct the Neapolitan troops into the kingdom, since such a movement would be fatal to the independence of Italy, and would, moreover, redound to the eternal disgrace of the Neapolitan army. He terminated the letters with the following sentence:—"In the mind of every citizen the duty which should supersede every other is that which redounds to the honour and glory of his country."

These letters were not answered; but the married officers received letters from their wives, informing them that their pensions would be forfeited, and imploring them to return. The Ferrara division mutinied, and the Papal authorities furnished it with transport and provisions to enable it to return to Naples. A few of the officers and privates joined Pepe, who advanced to Ferrara, and crossed the Po, on the 10th of June, with two battalions of Neapolitan regulars, one of Lombard volunteers, one of Bolognese volunteers, and a battery of artillery. Proceeding to Venice, viá Rovigo and Padua, he was nominated commander of the insurgent forces by the Provisional Government, and made energetic preparations for the defence of the city. The Neapolitan Government, through their consul at Venice, induced the greater part of the Neapolitan soldiers to return, however, only three hundred and twenty remaining. Manin, at the suggestion of Mazzini, urged the Provisional Government at Milan to send to Venice the Polish refugees and deserters who were held inactive there; but they were immediately sent, under Mickiewicz, to the camp of Charles Albert.

The Piedmontese army became inactive after the badly-conducted and unsuccessful attack on Rivoli, on the 5th of May, Charles Albert waiting, it was said, for reinforcements, though he knew that Nugent was marching to join Radetzky, and that the junction would give a considerable numerical superiority to the Austrians. Nugent's advance caused the Roman forces, under General Durando, to retire upon Vicenza, and Radetzky attempted to relieve Peschiera, which, however, capitulated on the 31st. Radetzky then turned his army against Vicenza, which was vigorously defended by Durando, who, however, found himself obliged to capitulate on the 10th of June, engaging to withdraw beyond the Po, and remain inactive for three months. This was a serious blow to the Italian cause, and proportionately damaging to the reputation of Charles Albert, who, instead of attempting to relieve Vicenza, marched upon Verona. Radetzky hurried back to Verona, and Charles Albert retired. The Austrians forced the passage of the Val d'Arca on the 12th, and Padua and Treviso capitulated on the following day.

There was then a lull in the military operations for a month, during which the opposing forces were concentrated between the Mincio and the Adige. Mantua was invested by Charles Albert on the 13th of July, and on the 22nd the Piedmontese repulsed the Austrians at Rivoli, but abandoned the position during the night, and retired to Peschiera. On the following day the Piedmontese suffered a defeat at Custozza, and retreated across the Mincio. On the 25th they were beaten again at Valeggio, and continued their retreat, raising the siege of Mantua, and falling back upon the Oglio, followed by the victorious Austrians.

These reverses produced a profound agitation in Milan. Excited masses of people traversed the streets, loudly accusing Charles Albert of treachery, calling for barricades, and proclaiming war to the knife against Austria. Shots were fired at the windows of Charles Albert's quarters, and he had some difficulty in leaving the city to continue his retreat. On the 28th the powers of the Provisional Government were concentrated in the hands of Maestri, Restelli, and Fanti, who were recommended by Mazzini, though only the first was a Republican, Restelli being a partisan of the union of Lombardy and Piedmont under Charles Albert, and Fanti without any decided political views of any kind, but a good soldier. "The defence of the city, not the triumph of my own party, directed the choice," says Mazzini.

On the night of the 3rd of August, Restelli and Fanti went to Lodi to learn Charles Albert's intentions, but could not obtain an interview with him. General Bava assured them, however, that the army would march to their relief. On the following day, General Olivieri arrived with a decree appointing himself and the Marquises of Montezemolo and Stigelli military commissioners, and they immediately assumed the direction of affairs. Mazzini then left Milan, and joined at Bergamo the column of Garibaldi, who, after the defeat at Custozza, had marched to Monza, to operate on the flank of the Austrians. Two days afterwards the Austrians entered Milan, and on the 9th a convention was concluded by Charles Albert with the enemy, by which the former agreed to evacuate all the places in Lombardy held by his troops.

Mazzini immediately issued a manifesto, proclaiming that the war of kings had terminated, and that of the people was about to begin. The effects of the feelings which dictated this announcement were soon visible. The indignation of Milan found echoes in Florence, Leghorn, and Rome. Garibaldi and his few thousands of ill-provided volunteers were soon driven over the Swiss frontier by the Austrians; but Young Italy rose at Leghorn under the direction of Guerazzi, and traversed the streets with cries of Viva la Repubblica! A deputation of the citizens, headed by Guerazzi, went to Florence, and had an interview with the Grand Duke, who, with the usual temporising policy of the Italian sovereigns, neither formally acceded to their demands, nor absolutely rejected them.

At Rome the popular excitement was so great that the Pope dismissed his Ministers as unequal to the occasion, and called to his councils Count Rossi, who had been the French Ambassador at Rome. The new Minister propounded a scheme of an Italian Confederation, such as had been entertained by the Carbonari, but Charles Albert would have nothing to do with it; and it is probable that Rossi only proposed it in the hope of appeasing the popular excitement. His assassination on the 15th of November, the day on which the Roman Chambers met, produced so much consternation that the Deputies separated immediately, and a vague feeling of uneasiness pervaded all classes. Alison has endeavoured to fix the odium of this crime upon Young Italy. "The secret societies," he says, "had determined that the principal Minister was to be assassinated; they had decided by lot who was to strike the blow." It is now well known, however, that the crime was instigated by the ecclesiastical party, who saw in a lay Minister an agency by which their influence would soon be destroyed.

The Ministers having left the Chamber without moving an adjournment, the leaders of Young Italy mustered the initiated, and proceeded in the evening to the Quirinal, preceded by a banner inscribed with the names of those whom they wished the Pope to accept as Ministers, and followed by an immense crowd. The gates of the palace were closed on their approach, and the Swiss Guards received them with a volley. The unarmed crowd fell back ; but presently returned, accompanied by the National Guards, armed and in uniform, who commenced firing at the windows and through the gates. The Swiss returned the fire, and an incessant rattle of musketry continued for some time, with loss of life on both sides, until the assailants brought up a cannon, with which they battered open the gates. The Swiss then ceased firing, and the names on the banner were submitted to the Pope, who refused to accept them. The multitude without became so menacing, however, that he at length signed the decree for their appointment, which was received by the people with acclamations, and celebrated with an illumination.

On the 24th he fled to Gaeta, whence he refused to return on the invitation of the Mamiani Ministry, and the Chambers appointed a triumvirate, consisting of Prince Corsini, Zucchini, a popular leader of the Bolognese, and Macerata, mayor of Ancona. The agitation for a Constituent Assembly caused the resignation of Mamiani, and measures were taken for the convocation of an assembly of the people's representatives with as little delay as possible. Pius IX. thundered from Gaeta against the Revolution, appealed for aid to foreign Powers, and ordered Count Latour, who commanded the Swiss Guards at Bologna and Forli, to repair to Gaeta. Latour temporised awhile, and then refused, fraternising with the civic authorities at Bologna, while many of the Swiss, including all the artillery, followed the example, others deserting, and returning to Switzerland.

Garibaldi contrived to reach Rome with three thousand volunteers and refugees ; and Mazzini arrived at Leghorn, where he was received with ringing of bells and waving of flags, and waited upon by a deputation of citizens, whom he advised to await the course of events at Florence and Rome. A few days afterwards, on the 10th of February, 1849, the Constituent Assembly met at Rome, proclaimed the government Republican, and nominated a triumvirate, consisting of Armellini, Saliceti, and Montecchi. Out of one hundred and forty-four members present, only eleven voted against the proclamation of the Republic as inopportune; and only five against the extinction of the temporal power of the Pope. All through the Roman provinces the announcement of the change was hailed with joy. The old municipalities, elected under the Papal régime, sent in their adhesion; those elected a month afterwards by universal suffrage did the same. There was not a single attempt at resistance, a single sign of dissent, a single protest in favour of the fallen power.

On the 18th, a bloodless revolution was accomplished at Florence, the army fraternising with the people, and the Grand Duke joining the Pope at Gaeta. Two days later, an enthusiastic assemblage at Leghorn nominated a committee of defence, composed of Guerazzi, Montanelli, and Zannetti; and Mazzini, who had been watching the progress of events, and preparing for them, proceeded to Rome.

Charles Albert had, in the meantime, been obliged by popular clamour to dismiss his Ministers, and renew the war; and the Provisional Governments at Rome and Florence decreed the raising of fifteen thousand Romans and twelve thousand Tuscans as their respective contingents to the army of Italian Independence. Venice was still holding out, and a deputation of citizens had offered the dictatorship to Pepe, who advised, however, that increased powers should be given to Manin until a Constituent Assembly could be invoked. This course was adopted, and a triumvirate constituted by the Assembly, in the persons of Manin, Admiral Graziani, and Cavedalis, as excellent a military engineer as he was a sound patriot.

The armistice terminated on the 20th of March, and the Piedmontese army, which had been concentrated about Novara, under the command of the Polish refugee, General Chrzanowski, immediately crossed the Ticino. Six thousand Lombard troops, formerly in the Austrian army, were at Casteggio, on the right bank of the Po, under the traitor Ramorino, who, on Radetzky crossing the Ticino with fifty-five thousand Austrians, crossed the Po, and left open the road from Pavia to Turin. On the 21st, the enemy stormed Mortara, and drove the centre of Charles Albert's army back towards Turin, isolating Ramorino, and cutting off Chrzanowski from his base of operations. On the following day the Piedmontese, though they behaved with great gallantry, were completely defeated at Novara, in that disastrous battle which Alison thought, even in 1859, had "determined, probably for ages, the cause of Italian Independence." Charles Albert immediately abdicated, and made a secret visit, in a false name, to the Austrian camp, where he had a long conference with Count Thurn, after which he proceeded privately to Nice.

Immense excitement was produced in Turin by these events, and the Chambers resolved to continue the war. But an armistice had been already concluded, and the occupation of Piedmont by Austrian troops acceded to as the condition. The Chambers rejected the armistice, and declared the Ministers guilty of treason—a resolution which had no other effect than to decide the new king, Victor Emmanuel, to dissolve them. At Genoa the popular indignation rose to a high pitch. Avezzana, who commanded the National Guards, closed the gates, had the tocsin sounded, and was allowed by the commandant, General Azarba, to occupy two of the forts. The populace, under the guidance of the leaders of Young Italy, constructed barricades; and a Provisional Government was established, with Avezzana at the head. Azarba ordered the troops to attack the defenders of the barricades, and a terrible conflict in the streets ensued, ending in the defeat of the troops, who were thereupon led out of the city by the commandant.

Brescia rose in revolt on the 31st, and the insurgents were only beaten after a fearful carnage, and the partial devastation of the city by bombardment. Venice still held out, but was reduced to the greatest extremity. On the 4th of April, General La Marmora appeared before Genoa with thirty thousand soldiers, stormed the forts and bombarded the city. An armistice was agreed to, but La Marmora insisted upon unconditional surrender; and the conflict recommenced. It was a hopeless struggle, however; and during the night of the 7th the insurgents fled into the mountains, where they were joined by many refugees from Brescia, and other towns in Lombardy. Avezzana, with about five hundred more, made their way to Rome, and joined the legion of Garibaldi. The Austrians having reduced the Lombards to submission, entered Tuscany and the Romagna, to restore the rule of the Grand Duke. A counter-revolution was brought about at Florence on the 10th, and the resistance of Leghorn was overcome by Austrian bayonets. Bologna capitulated on the 14th of May, after an hour's bombardment, and Ancona about a month later.

Only Rome and Venice remained Republican. In the former city a change of Government was made after the battle of Novara, a new triumvirate being formed by Mazzini, Armellini, and Saffi, the last having previously been Minister of the Interior. The three months, during which the chief of Young Italy ruled in Rome, can be compared only with the earlier period of the tribunate of Rienzi. For the first time since that period Justice and Humanity were installed by the side of Liberty. Life and property were not merely as safe as they had been before the revolution; they had never been so safe before. There was no proscription, no restriction of individual freedom. The few persons arrested were traitors to their country, men discovered to have secretly communicated with its invaders. Freedom of worship, freedom of the press, freedom of speech—all unknown before in Rome—were complete.

The Roman's dream of liberty was rudely dispelled by the thunder of the French cannon. On the 30th of June, when Oudinot was in possession of the heights and the bastions, a military council was held. Mazzini proposed that he and his colleagues should quit Rome with the army, fall upon the Austrian line of operations between Bologna and Ancona, and raise the Romagna by the charm of a first victory. Avezzana, now Minister of War, and the Roman chiefs, declared for continued resistance; but Garibaldi, Pisucane, Roselli, and other military men, supported the proposition of Mazzini. None suggested capitulation. When the triumvir's plan was proposed to the Assembly it was rejected; and Cernuschi's proposal to capitulate was adopted. Mazzini and his colleagues thereupon resigned, and prepared to quit Rome.

Alison states that Mazzini left the city with Garibaldi and five thousand of the defenders of Rome, chiefly Lombards, at midnight on the 1st of July. But Mazzini's own narrative of those events shows that the triumvirs did not leave Rome until the 3rd, on which day the French entered, and that they proceeded to Civita Vecchia; while the march of the Garibaldians was directed inland. Finding the road to Naples blocked by a large force, under Marshal Nunziante, Garibaldi took the cross road leading to Terni, and on the 16th reached Orvieto. He then crossed the Apennines, and made for the Adriatic coast, with the Austrians on his track. And on the 31st—by which time fatigue and desertions had reduced his column to a thousand men—he was attacked by them near San Marino, and the greater part of his force killed or taken prisoners. Garibaldi, with about a hundred desperate companions, escaped to Cesenatico, where they seized some fishing-boats, and put to sea, with the hope of reaching Venice. Some of the boats were captured by Austrian cruisers; but Garibaldi eluded them, and reached in safety the coast of Illyria.

Venice had fallen, and when Charles Albert breathed his last at Oporto, he had seen the nation he had betrayed ground once more under the heel of a foreign despot. Mazzini, before quitting Rome, had published an eloquent protest against the French intervention, and arranged a system of secret correspondence with Giuseppe Petroni, a Bolognese patriot, whose constancy in Republican principles had remained unbroken by twenty years' incarceration in a Papal prison, and who conducted, jointly with Mazzini, the journal La Roma del Popolo.* Then, provided by the British Consul with a passport, he hastened to Civita Vecchia, at which port he obtained a passage to Marseilles; thence he proceeded in disguise to Geneva, and began again to draw together the broken threads of Young Italy. Armellini proceeded to Brussels, and Saffi, who parted from his companions at Civita Vecchia, sailed from that port to Malta, whence he afterwards embarked for England.

The arrests which took place on the return of the Pope, and the seizure of the presses of La Roma del Popolo, broke the links which connected Rome with other ramifications of the Society, which subsequently to the events just related had its greatest strength in Lombardy. No attempt at insurrection was made until 1852, when an abortive conspiracy at Mantua caused the sacrifice of three lives upon the scaffold. A more formidable conspiracy was organised at Milan; and a military officer, sent to that city by Mazzini, reported favourably of the plan. The arrangements seem, indeed, to have been as perfect as they well could be ; but, as often happens in such cases, failure at a single point involved the collapse of the whole plan. The first movement failed, the leader fled at once from Milan, and all the bands dispersed, supposing that the outbreak had been postponed, except two, which surprised the palace. The movement was quickly suppressed, however, and fourteen artisans, who took part in it, were seized and executed.

Another abortive rising at Massa Carrara, in the autumn of 1853, was followed by the arrest of Count Felice Orsini, who had joined Young Italy in 1843, and had served the Roman Republic with courage and energy as military administrator at Ascoli. After enduring two months' solitary imprisonment, he was discharged from custody ; but he was ordered to leave the dominions of Victor Emmanuel, and escorted by police to a steamer about to proceed on her voyage to England. He did not long remain inactive. Like Pepe, like Mazzini, and many more, he lived in the midst of a constant conspiracy against the rulers of his country. His life had been a series of plots and imprisonment, and it continued so to the end of his career. Having gained the confidence of Mazzini by his services under the Roman Triumvirate, he was entrusted in the following spring with an important secret mission, the precise object of which remains unknown, but which seems to have been connected with a wide-spread conspiracy, the success of which would have effected the disruption of the heterogeneous empire of the Hapsburgs. The key to this movement was in the hands of Ledru-Rollin, Mazzini, and Kossuth; and its ramifications extended from the Pyrenees to the remotest limits of Austria.

Assuming the name of Tito Celsi, Orsini proceeded to Switzerland, and crossed the frontier without detection; but the primary object of his mission was not accomplished, and his movements drew upon him the suspicions of the police. On attempting to return to Switzerland, he found himself watched so narrowly that he withdrew from inns and highways, and struck into the mountain paths, in order to elude the vigilance of the enemy. For several days peril hung upon his footsteps, but at length he succeeded in crossing the French frontier, and got safely back to Switzerland. He probably waited there for orders from the chiefs of the conspiracy, for he did not move again until June, when he proceeded to Samaden and St. Moritz, in the Engadine, to organise an expedition, which, however, was not undertaken, the movement which should have preceded it having been abortive. Arms and ammunition were introduced for the use of the insurgents, and, these being seized by the police, Orsini was arrested on the charge of having introduced them with a treasonable design. He contrived to escape from the custody of the police, however, and, having effected some change in his personal appearance, he set out for Milan, under the assumed name of George Hernagh.

Taking Turin in his way, he arrived at Milan early in October, and proceeded from that city to Venice. That his mission had a wider scope than might be inferred from a secret journey to the capitals of the Sardinian kingdom and the Lombardo-Venetian viceroyalty is evident from his risking arrest by the Austrian police for the purpose of proceeding from Venice to Hermanstadt, the capital of Transylvania, viâ Trieste, Vienna, and Pesth. He reached Hermanstadt undetected, but he was there arrested, and taken, handcuffed, to Vienna. The questions put to him, and the rigour with which he had been treated, showing that he was known, he acknowledged that he was Count Orsini, but protested that he had taken part in no political movement since 1848, and that the object of his visit was to enter the Austrian army, to facilitate which purpose he had taken the name of George Hernagh. This statement seemed to be corroborated by a letter from Marshal Salis, which was found in his possession ; but the Viennese authorities regarded the story with suspicion, and, after repeated interrogatories, he was sent to Mantua, and confined in the castle of San Giorgio.

The treatment of political prisoners in Austria was not marked at that time by the brutality and vindictive refinement of cruelty by which it had been characterised a quarter of a century earlier ; but intercourse with the outer world was still strictly prohibited, and the discipline of the prisons was either maintained with greater precision, or the gaolers were less accessible to sympathy with political prisoners at Mantua than at Spielberg. Orsini found that he could not communicate with friends through their medium ; but he possessed a secret means of communication which they could not penetrate, and which has never been discovered.

“ Although,” he says, “ the turnkeys refused again and again to assist me in sending and receiving news from without, I managed to carry on intercourse with my friends. Persons not residing in Italy were acquainted with the minutest details concerning myself, my trial, and the trials of other prisoners. How that intercourse was managed Austria must never know; that she can never find out, despite the wonderful detective faculties of her police. They have discovered much concerning our conspiracies, as they are pleased to term them, and our methods of carrying them on; but there is no body of police existing, not even excepting those employed by Louis Napoleon, who are not sometimes outwitted. The means we use are simple enough; the art lies in the dexterity and audacity of the individual—and ‘practice makes perfect.’ I take credit to myself for the originality of my plans; and since I feel convinced that Austria will exhaust her rage and disappointment in vain efforts to gain a single clue to them, my readers must be content with knowing just as much as Austria has found out concerning my escape, and no more.”*

That he did receive help from without in the shape of several small saws of the finest steel is certain; and without those implements he could not have effected an escape the narrative of which vies in interest with those of Trenck and Pignata. The window of his cell was a hundred and four feet above the bottom of a fosse which surrounds the castle, and which sometimes contains water, but more often only mud. Beyond the fosse is a wall twenty feet high, and, that surmounted, a fugitive endeavouring to escape in that direction would find his flight barred by a gate—closed at night, and guarded by sentinels—which gives access to a bridge over a stream that meanders sluggishly through the marshes which environ Mantua on every side. Escape in that direction was impracticable, therefore, but Orsini had conceived a project, the realisation of which was just possible, though attended with so much difficulty and danger that few men would have ventured to attempt it.

There was no glass in the window of his cell, the only means of excluding wind and rain being a canvas blind; but it was guarded by two gratings, formed of iron bars of great thickness. To saw through these bars, which crossed each other, was a work of considerable labour, and occupied for several days the intervals during which the prisoner was left to himself; and during that time he was in constant dread that the turnkeys would surprise him at his task, or discover that the bars, though in their places, were severed. The hard and tedious task was at length accomplished, however, and a long rope, formed by tearing into slips two sheets and a towel, securely fastened to one of the bars.

It was a dark night, and Orsini could not see, as he knelt on the ledge outside his window, whether there was any water in the fosse; but he grasped his linen rope firmly, at the same time twisting his legs round it, and began to descend. About four-fifths of the descent had been safely accomplished when the rope slipped from his legs, and, not being able to recover it, he resolved to drop the remaining distance, which, as well as he could judge from the obscurity of a moonless night, did not exceed six feet.

The depth below him was much greater than he had calculated, however, and he fell heavily on the dry bottom of the fosse, hurting one of his legs so much that he thought at first that it was broken, and receiving several severe contusions. Raising himself with pain and difficulty, he groped his way along the fosse until he reached an arched passage leading from the fortress, under which it passes, to the city. This passage is closed by a grating, which the fugitive contrived to surmount by forcing a large nail into the cement between the stones of the wall, and raising himself by putting one foot on it, and dragging himself to the top with his hands. He then dropped to the other side, and groped his way through the passage until he found himself in front of a portion of the castle which overlooks the street leading to the gate and bridge of San Giorgio. His arms were now so stiff and swollen that he found himself unable to drag himself out of the fosse, and, after several unavailing efforts, he sat down, utterly exhausted, to wait for daylight, hoping that he might then obtain assistance from some passing stranger.

Soon after daybreak artisans and peasants began to pass, but in response to the fugitive's appeal for help, coupled with the statement that he had fallen into the fosse the night before, while intoxicated, most of them laughed, or hurried on in silence, perhaps surmising the truth, and fearing to assist him. Two peasants at length threw the end of a rope to him, and extricated him from his dangerous position. Thanking them for their friendly aid, he hurried from the spot, and concealed himself among the reeds of the marsh until night.

“Where I then went,” he adds, “or who helped me, I leave to the Austrian police to discover.” Perhaps, now that Italy is free, the rest of the story may some day be told. In the meantime, it must suffice the reader to learn that he reached Switzerland in safety, and, after a short stay in that country, proceeded through France to England. "I was in doubt," he says, "whether I could pass through France without falling into the hands of Louis Napoleon's gendarmes. But I resolved to try, and had the honour of remaining several days in Paris, under the nose of Signor Pietri, the chief superintendent of the Emperor's police."

The scheme of revolt which Young Italy failed to execute in 1854 was revived in 1857, when attempts were made at Genoa and Leghorn to surprise the arsenals, and Colonel Pisucane seized a steamer at Naples, liberated the political prisoners confined on the isle of Poriza, and disembarked them on the coast, to co-operate with the initiated there in a movement intended to be general. The attempts at Genoa and Leghorn failed, however, and Pisucane's band was surrounded soon after landing, and all killed or captured and imprisoned, the gallant leader being among the slain.

Orsini's plot for the assassination of the Emperor of the French, by throwing grenades into his carriage, was formed shortly afterwards, and he went to Paris, with some other Italian refugees, to execute it. Its failure was followed by his arrest, trial, and execution for the crime, which was generally believed at the time to have been attempted in conformity with the sentence of a Carbonaro tribunal upon Napoleon as a perjured and traitorous member of the Society. That the Emperor had been in his youth a member of the Carbonari there can be very little doubt,* but Orsini was never a Carbonaro, and therefore could not have been called upon to execute the sentence supposed to have been passed upon Napoleon III. as the vengeance of the Society for the attack on Rome.

The extent and results of the share of France in the war of 1859 seem a sufficient refutation of the belief that Napoleon's decision for war with Austria, as the ally of Victor Emmanuel, was the condition upon which he obtained from the Carbonari the reversal of the supposed sentence. The war was terminated by Napoleon as soon as the scheme of Charles Albert for the union of Lombardy and Piedmont was secured, and, in return for his aid, Napoleon demanded the cession of Savoy and Nice. Venetia was left in the grasp of Austria, and the French troops were not withdrawn from Rome. These results did not fulfil the programme either of the Carbonari or of Young Italy.

The work which Napoleon left unfinished was continued and almost completed by Mazzini. Travelling in disguise from London to Lugano, and again finding a courageous and enterprising supporter in Garibaldi, he exerted all the influence of Young Italy to make the war one for the unity and independence of the Peninsula. He wrote to Victor Emmanuel, promising him the earnest support of the Society on the condition that the war should be conducted for those ends; and the King, through Brofferio, the historian, proposed a conference, an offer which was met by Mazzini with an emphatic declaration that he would be a party to no compromise, and that Victor Emmanuel and himself must work separately, each for his own aim, unless the former would pronounce unreservedly for the national unity and independence. He did not ask for even the initiative of Piedmont; he asked only that the Government should secretly support Garibaldi, and he promised in return absolute secrecy on the subject of the compact.

Victor Emmanuel hesitated; Count Cavour, whose popularity had been shaken by the results of the campaign in Lombardy, and who had been temporarily succeeded by Ratazzi, returned to office, and Mazzini's scheme was dropped. He had again ventured to enter Italy, and now urged Garibaldi to act alone, trusting that Victor Emmanuel would become accessory to the revolution after its accomplishment, though he would not while it remained to be realised. Pilo, an ardent young Sicilian, started for Palermo with funds furnished by Young Italy, and raised a revolt, but fell in the moment of victory. Garibaldi followed, and a committee was formed at Genoa under the direction of Mazzini, for the revolutionising of Central Italy. It was his wish to direct an expedition into the Papal territories, but the thousands of volunteers who came forward were all eager to follow Garibaldi; and it was not until twenty thousand men and large quantities of arms had been sent to Sicily that eight thousand volunteers were enrolled for the Roman expedition, which Garibaldi was to support by advancing from Naples. Victor Emmanuel was willing to connive at this movement on the condition that the republican flag should not be raised, and to this Mazzini assented. On Central Italy being revolutionised Garibaldi was to advance to the Po, and the Austrian Government summoned to withdraw from Venetia. At the eleventh hour, however, the King revoked his consent, and the volunteers enrolled for the Roman expedition were sent to Naples, where the command of the revolutionary army had been assumed in his name by Medici, Bixio, and Cosenz. Young Italy was baffled, but not defeated. The Romagnese revolted, and Garibaldi, exasperated by the brutalities committed by the Papal troops at Perugia, threatened to march upon Rome. The Piedmontese Government felt constrained to act, and troops were marched into Parma and Modena. "If we are not there before Garibaldi," Cavour wrote to Talleyrand, the French Minister at Turin, "we are lost. The revolution will invade Central Italy. We are constrained to act."

Mazzini, Saffi, Cattaneo, and other chiefs of Young Italy urged Garibaldi to immediate action, and Mazzini went to Naples for the purpose of concerting measures for the extension of the revolutionary movement; but the gallant liberator of Southern Italy found himself unable to move effectually, and Mazzini, denounced by the agents of Cavour as aiming at a dictatorship, left Naples before the arrival of Victor Emmanuel, by whose side Garibaldi rode into that city. Posterity will have some difficulty in determining whether the palm of patriotism should be awarded to Mazzini or to Garibaldi.

The revolutionary movement of 1860, checked by the interposition of the Piedmontese Government, was arrested at the Po and at the gates of Rome. Garibaldi differed with Mazzini subsequently as to whether the next movement should be directed against the Austrians or against the temporal power of the Pope. Mazzini advised action in Venetia; Garibaldi, deluded by an understanding with the Italian Government that an expedition to Rome would be connived at, commenced the unfortunate movement that terminated at Aspromonte. He could not believe that hostility was intended, even when he saw the troops sent to intercept him; but a shattered foot and imprisonment in the fortress of Varignano convinced him of the mistake which he had made in trusting to the promise of either Victor Emmanuel or his Minister.

Mazzini remained under sentence of death until 1865, when his election as the representative of Messina in the Italian Parliament induced the King to pardon him. An act dictated solely by policy could not convert into a Monarchist so earnest a Republican as Mazzini. He had done violence to his own principles for the sake of his country when he offered to co-operate with Victor Emmanuel in 1859, and the rebuff which he then sustained confirmed him in them. In 1870 he sailed for Palermo with the intention of organising a republican insurrection in Sicily, but he was arrested at sea by order of General Medici, the governor, and consigned to the fortress of Gaeta. After an incarceration of two months he was liberated, and returned to London, viâ Rome and Genoa.

Devoted to the last hour of his life to one all-absorbing idea of duty, and never swerving from the motto of Young Italy, "Now and for ever," he soon proceeded to Lugano once more, and revived the journal La Roma del Popolo. His mental energy had survived his physical powers, however, and he repaired, in failing health, to Pisa, where he died on the 10th of March, 1872. His mortal remains were removed to Genoa for burial, and an immense concourse of all classes of his countrymen attended his funeral.

Italy is now united, free, and independent. She has taken the first place among the secondary powers of Europe. Though that distinction has not been achieved according to the ideal presented to her by the Carbonari or Young Italy, the influence of both associations on her progress towards unity and independence has been immense. They kept alive for half a century, by their secret meetings and their secret correspondence, the spirit of resistance to foreign domination and domestic misrule when the nation seemed to sleep upon its wrongs, and the princes and statesmen of Italy conspired with the foreign enemy against her; and there have been none of her sons to whom the Italy of to-day owes more than to Giuseppe Mazzini.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE FAMILIES.

NOTHING shows more forcibly that the cause of order is less endangered by the widest extension of popular franchises, and the greatest freedom of speech and the press, than by the secret associations to which the restriction of liberty gives birth, than the results of the trials which the French Liberals made during the reign of Louis Philippe of the comparative advantages of public and secret agitation. The failures and disasters which were the sole fruits of thirteen years' working of Carbonarism induced some of the adherents of that system to form, in 1833, the Society of the Rights of Man, which aimed at establishing the democratic principles of Robespierre by peaceful, legal, and constitutional means. The Society was no sooner launched into existence, however, than no fewer than twenty-seven of its members were prosecuted by the Soult-Thiers Ministry, as belonging to an illegal association founded for the propagation of principles subversive of social order; and, though they were acquitted, the Government made the occasion a pretext for introducing a measure for the amendment of the law of association, by providing that no society should be formed for any purpose, if consisting of more than twenty persons, even though divided into sections of less than twenty persons, whether meeting periodically or not, without the authorisation of the Government.* All persons belonging to unauthorised associations, or letting places of meeting to such, were rendered liable to fine and imprisonment. The enactment of this law was vehemently opposed in the Chambers, by the Legitimists as well as by the Liberals; but it passed on the 10th of April, 1834.

From that date until the fall of Louis Philippe the Chamber of Peers sat almost in permanent session as a tribunal for the trial of political offenders. There was shown to be less safety for men who assembled, with open doors, and in the presence of reporters and the police, to discuss political and social questions, than for those who met secretly to conspire the overthrow of the Government. Coupled with the restrictions on the press, which were rendered more severe by the measures known to history as the Laws of September, which eventually proved as fatal to Louis Philippe as the equally famous Ordinances of July to Charles X., they closed against all who did not sympathise with despotism every sphere of action but that of secret societies. The Chamber of Deputies, it must be remembered, no more represented the people of France than the House of Commons then represented the people of the United Kingdom ;

* A law similar to this was made by the British Parliament in the reign of Charles II., and is still in force, though in abeyance. Captain Adams, the Chairman of the Croydon Bench of Magistrates, told me, in 1848, that it was under this Act that the Government was acting in suppressing the Chartist meetings announced to be held on the 12th of June.

for no body can be said to truly represent the people unless directly elected by at least the majority of the people.

The new law of associations was followed within three months by the formation of a secret society much resembling the Carbonari, as reorganised after the counter-revolutions of Naples and Piedmont in 1821, being military in character, and so constituted that the leaders should remain unknown until the hour struck for the conflict. The unit of this Society was an aggregation of six members only, which, in the nomenclature of the Association was called a family; hence the Society became known collectively as the Families. Five or six families, united under the same chief, formed a section; and two or three sections a quarter, the chief of which received his instructions from the unknown members of the committee of direction, through one of the latter, who did not, however, divulge his real position, and was supposed to be an agent of the committee.

The principles of the Society corresponded very closely with those of the Society of the Rights of Man, and it was probably from that association that it enlisted its first members. It does not appear to have made much progress in the earlier years of its existence, which may have been due as much to the caution rendered necessary by the vigilance of the police and the severity of the laws, as to the extent to which the revolutionary rank and file had been thinned by the bloody conflicts which took place in Paris and Lyons in 1834, and the arrests and deportations which followed. In 1836 the Society counted only twelve hundred members; but it had ramifications in two regiments of the garrison of Paris, depôts of arms, and a manufactory of gunpowder.

The attempt made in that year by a young man named Alibaud to assassinate the King as he was proceeding in his carriage from the Tuileries to Neuilly caused the police to be even more than ordinarily vigilant. Domiciliary visits were made in the quarters inhabited by the working classes, who constituted the strength of the Families, as they had done of the Society of the Rights of Man; and discoveries were made which furnished a clue to the Association, and led to the arrest of several persons, against whom, however, nothing serious could be established. The Society was dissolved, therefore, and reconstituted under the name of the Society of the Seasons. The clue which the police had obtained led them nowhere, therefore, the Families, with everything pertaining to them, having suddenly and mysteriously passed out of existence.

The leaders of the Society did not declare themselves until 1839, but M. Louis Blanc has revealed the name of Martin Bernard, "a powerful thinker, with the courage of a Spartan," as the author of a scheme which was brought into operation about this time for the purpose of accustoming the members to assemble and disperse whenever and wherever they might be directed by their unknown chiefs, without knowing when and how the blow was to be struck. In accordance with this plan, they were called upon at irregular intervals to assemble at certain points at a time fixed immediately before; and the promptitude and punctuality with which these orders were obeyed served as a test of the efficiency of the organisation and the alacrity of the initiated to respond to the call of their chiefs.*

In 1838 the police discovered a manufactory of cartridges on the premises of an engraver named Raban, in the Palais Royal; but no clue could be found to the Society, which continued to prepare in secrecy the elements of another revolt. The number of members diminished by the following year, however, to one thousand, and it became evident to the leaders that they could not hold their followers together much longer without an attack on the Crown and Government of the "Citizen King," who had talked in 1830 of the glories of "a monarchy surrounded by republican institutions," and had been

* This plan reminds me of what took place in London on the night of the 29th of May, 1848, when the secret committee that directed the Chartist conspiracy tested the working of the new organisation which had been introduced into the National Charter Association in the preceding month, on the motion of Ernest Jones. Open air meetings were held on the evening of that day on Stepney and Clerkenwell Greens, and, on the conclusion of the proceedings at the latter place, a man named Fussell—said to have been the unknown individual who mortally wounded the constable in the Calthorpe Street affray in 1835—called out "Fall in!" and men who appeared to be known immediately began to marshal the immense throng in marching order, six abreast. Some one inquired whether anything was to be done that night. "I don't know," replied Fussell; "we shall see." The whole body marched down to Smithfield, and was there joined by those who had marched from Stepney Green on the conclusion of the proceedings. There this immense aggregate, estimated to have numbered eighty thousand men, marched in admirable order from Smithfield to Oxford Street, and thence viâ St. James's Street, Pall Mall, and the Strand, to Finsbury Square, where the men halted and dispersed. Considerable uneasiness was produced by the suddenness of the movement, the secrecy of the means by which it had been effected, the number of men who marched, and the thoroughness of their organisation.

engaged ever since in a permanent conspiracy against the rights of the people. It was determined, therefore, in the spring of 1839, to make the attempt at once.

The directing committee consisted at this time of Armand Barbès, a man of good education and considerable property, a sincere believer in the principles of social democracy, and a zealous worker for their realisation; Martin Bernard, already mentioned; Blanqui, then in his thirty-fourth year, and already a veteran revolutionist, having been wounded in 1827 in the affair of the Rue St. Denis, and fought again at the barricades in July, 1830; Guignot, Nétré, and Meillard, men who zealously co-operated with their colleagues, while content to follow where they led. By these men a rising against the Government of Louis Philippe was projected, and the 12th of May fixed for the dangerous enterprise. "As for the means," says M. Louis Blanc, "they were matter of tradition among the conspirators: to group together, under the pretext of a review, and unknown to each other, all the divisions in the vicinity of an armourer's warehouse, and distribute on the ground the muskets and cartridges, the previous distribution of which would have betrayed the plot."

Twelve thousand cartridges had been accumulated, and two depôts were procured in the vicinity of the warehouse of a gunmaker named Lepage, in the Rue Bourg l'Abbé, which had the reputation of being better stocked than any other in Paris. Blanqui proposed to seize the prefecture of police, occupy the bridges, and construct barricades thick enough to resist the attack of artillery. This plan was opposed by Barbès, on the grounds that a rising in the old quarter known as the City would be isolated, the construction of barricades of the strength proposed by Blanqui impracticable in the time that would elapse between the signal and the conflict, and the adoption by undisciplined men of a preconcerted system of tactics very difficult. These objections were overruled by his colleagues, however, and the plan of Blanqui was adopted.

Punctual to the hour fixed by their leaders for the rising, the Families mustered in the Rue Bourg l'Abbé, and made a sudden attack on Lepage's warehouse. The door resisting their efforts to force it, one of the insurgents effected an entrance by a window opening upon a court, and unfastened the door. His companions then poured in, and in a few minutes all the arms and cartridges which the place contained were distributed among them. They then separated into two columns, and proceeded to the dépôts, one column being led by Barbès, the other by Blanqui, the former having as lieutenants Meillard and Nétré, the latter Bernard and Guignot. Some delay and confusion occurred before the men could be got into marching order; but there was no time to be lost, and the efforts of Barbès, which were powerfully aided by his soldierly bearing and air of command, succeeded in starting them in some sort of order towards the quays.

Hurrying across the bridge of Notre Dame, the column led by Barbès was soon before the Palace of Justice, where it was challenged by the sentries. The officer of the guard, Drouineau, turned out his men in haste on seeing an armed force, and replied to the summons of Barbès to surrender with a refusal. Two shots were thereupon fired by the insurgents, and Drouineau fell, mortally wounded. The guard fired immediately, and retreated into the guard-house, which was carried with a rush by the insurgents, and the defenders disarmed. The firing had alarmed the Prefecture, however, and the insurgents were not strong enough to attack it with any chance of success. Thus the leading feature of Blanqui's plan proved impracticable at the outset. Firing being heard in the direction of the Place du Châtelet, upon which Blanqui's column had marched, Barbès led his followers at the double to its support. A conflict had taken place, and some of the insurgents had fallen, and others had fled. A hasty consultation between the leaders resulted in the decision that their united bands were too weak to oppose troops upon an open space, and the word was given to disperse through the narrow streets, and reform on the Place de Grève.

The Hôtel de Ville was occupied without difficulty, and from the steps of that historic building, which has witnessed so many strange scenes, Barbès read a proclamation of La République, démocratique et sociale. Then the insurgents charged into the Place St. Jean, and carried the guard-house there, after a severe conflict, in which much blood was shed on both sides. The day was now drawing to a close, and nothing of importance had been accomplished. The leaders were surprised by the apathy with which their enterprise seemed to be regarded by the people, so different to the excitement manifested on every such occasion a few years before. Some four or five hundred men joined them during the struggle, but there was no pouring out of the myriads of the faubourgs, as there had been in 1832 and 1835. Surprise and wonder were now the strongest feelings manifested by the majority. "I myself," says M. Louis Blanc, "on that dismal day saw, within twenty paces of the Rue de la Paix, four young men pass by, with muskets on their shoulders, hastening, with proud and angry looks, in the direction of the firing. The few pedestrians in the street made way for them, and gazed after them with astonishment and dread."

The forlorn aspect of their enterprise impressed the conspirators very strongly, but they would not, and could not very well, yet abandon it. Directing the insurgents to sing the Marseillaise Hymn, they led them through the Rue Simon le Franc, the Rue Beaubourg, and the Rue Transnonain, and threw up three barricades in the Rue Grenetat. The inspiring stanzas of Rouget elicited no response, and the final struggle was at hand. The barricades were attacked by the troops, and, after a sanguinary conflict, in which the insurgents fought with the fierce energy of despair, the defences were carried, and the insurgents slain, captured, or dispersed. Twenty prisoners were taken, and sixteen were arrested afterwards. Among the former were Barbès—with blood-stained face, and hands blackened with gunpowder, having received a wound in the head—Bernard, Meillard, and Guignot, the two latter also wounded. Blanqui was among those who escaped for the moment, but was arrested afterwards by the police.

The trial of the conspirators commenced on the 27th of June, the accused being divided into two categories, the first of which included Barbès and Bernard, the former specially charged with the assassination of Drouineau. This accusation was indignantly repelled by Barbès, both on the ground that the killing of the officer was not an assassination, but one of the chances of war, and because it was not, as he alleged, his hand that fired the fatal shot. He assumed the sole responsibility of the outbreak, and declared his fellow-prisoners innocent, on the ground that they were unaware of the purpose for which they had been assembled until they were led against the guard-house of the Palace of Justice. This was the truth; but it could not affect the legal guilt of the prisoners, who, with four exceptions, were convicted. Judgment was pronounced by the Chamber of Peers on the 12th of July, when Barbès was condemned to death, Bernard to transportation to Cayenne, and the remainder of the convicted to terms of imprisonment, varying from two to fifteen years.

The capital sentence was not executed upon Barbès however, several memorials being presented to the King, praying for its remission, on the ground that the offence of which he had been convicted was a political one. One of these memorials emanated from the students of Paris, three thousand of whom made a demonstration of sympathy with the condemned man by walking in procession with it from the Place de Vendôme to the Chancellerie. Lamartine has taken to himself all the credit of the royal clemency, however, by ignoring these memorials, and stating that Barbès was pardoned on his appeal to the King, through M. Montalivet, at the instance of the prisoner's sister.* The sentence was commuted into imprisonment for life.

The remainder of the prisoners were not brought to trial until six months afterwards, when all but two were convicted: Blanqui being condemned to death, and twenty-six others to terms of imprisonment varying from three to fifteen years. The life of Barbès having been spared, Blanqui could not well be sent to the guillotine; and there was perhaps another reason for such clemency, which will be referred to presently.

The Society of the Seasons was reorganised after the abortive outbreak of 1839; and the places of the imprisoned chiefs were taken by Gallois, an obscure political writer, Noyer, and Dubosc. More able men succeeded these in 1842, when some further changes were made, and the direction of the Society was assumed by a committee, consisting of Caussidière, afterwards prefect of police under the Provisional Government of 1848; Leroux, a manufacturer of straw mats and matting; and two friends of Caussidière's, Léontre and Grandmesnil, both men of good repute, and the former a member of the literary profession.

It was difficult for secret societies to assemble during the latter years of the reign of Louis Philippe; and the zeal of the initiated had to be kept alive by orders of the day, issued sometimes from Paris, and sometimes from Brussels. Some of these fell into the hands of the police, and it was found necessary to adopt additional precautions, and to limit the relations between the initiated and their chiefs. Another reorganisation took place in 1846, when Caussidière and Léontre retired from the direction of the Society, the latter at that time joining the staff of the Réforme. They were succeeded by Flocon, the chief editor of that journal, and Albert, a mechanic, afterwards one of the secretaries of the Provisional Government of 1848.

About this time a schism arose in the Society on the question agitated by Proudhon and Cabet; and the disciples of those able and zealous chiefs of Communism seceded from the Society, and formed themselves into another, with the name of the Dissidents. Their leaders were Flotte, a friend of Blanqui's; Chenu, afterwards discovered to be an agent of the secret police; Culot and Gueret. Both societies held themselves ready to commence hostilities against the Government at a word from their chiefs; and Caussidière affirms that they were "animated by the same sentiment, and were more bent on revolution than on social theories. Muskets were more often spoken of than Communism; and the only formula unanimously accepted was the declaration of rights of Robespierre."*

For more than a year before the memorable explosion of February, 1848, these two societies had been preparing for an insurrection, and for directing towards the establishment of a Republic the ebullition of popular wrath, which every one save Louis Philippe and his Ministers saw was inevitable. They had seen, however, in repeated failures and disasters the imprudence of initiating of themselves a movement for the establishment of a Republic; and they waited for the time when the progress of the agitation for electoral reform should bring about a crisis. Until that moment the chiefs of the secret societies kept in the background, and allowed the Parliamentary leaders of the Liberal party to enjoy all the honours of the reform agitation; while they laboured in secret, and made the Opposition deputies their unwitting tools. But when blood had been shed, and barricades raised, and the National Guards were fairly committed in the revolutionary struggle, the members of the secret societies were the most active of the insurgents; they knew then that their object would be accomplished.

On the evening of the 20th of February a meeting was held at the offices of the Réforme, to determine the course to be adopted on the 22nd, for which day the last of the series of reform banquets was announced. Flocon presided, and there were present Caussidière, Albert, Etienne Arago (brother of the great astronomer), Baune, Thoré (a journalist and artist of considerable repute), Lagrange, and other members of the secret societies, with Louis Blanc, Colonel Rey, and a couple of provincial journalists of Republican proclivities—namely, Delecluze, editor of the Impartial du Nord, and Pont, editor of the Haro de Caen. It was known that the Government, after allowing no fewer than seventy public banquets of the Liberals to take place in the provinces, had first declared the proposed demonstration in Paris to be illegal; and then suggested a compromise, according to which the gathering was to be allowed to take place on the condition that it should disperse on the summons of a commissary of police, and the question of its legality be submitted to the tribunals. The Parliamentary leaders of the Liberal party had met at the house of Lamartine to consider the situation ; and the result of their deliberation was awaited with some anxiety, as upon it much would depend.

About ten o'clock came Ledru-Rollin, who informed them that the majority of the Liberal deputies were disposed to accept the compromise offered by the Government, but that the banquet committee were resolved to carry out their programme at all hazards. An animated discussion ensued, some of those assembled being content to protest against the action of the Government, and others being eager for an outbreak. The latter expressed their conviction that a hundred thousand men would be arrayed against the Government as soon as the first shot was fired ; while the less sanguine feared that an insurrectionary movement would be immediately crushed, and that the Government would make it a pretext for depriving the nation of the little liberty it had been allowed to retain. It was finally resolved, after much debate, that the chiefs of the secret societies should assemble on the Place de la Madeleine, the rendezvous for the procession, and, in the event of a tumult occurring, hurry to the Réforme office, and concert measures for organising the revolt, and giving it a Republican character.

Delahodde, who had been a member of the Families since 1835, gives some curious statistics of the strength of the Republican party at this time, according to which it was "composed of the following persons :—There were four thousand subscribers to the National, of whom only one half were Republicans, the others belonging to the dynastic Opposition, led by Garnier-Pagès and Carnot. Of these two thousand there were not more than six hundred in Paris, and of these only two hundred could be relied on in an actual conflict. The Réforme had two thousand subscribers, of whom five hundred were in Paris, and would turn out to a man. The two societies, the Seasons and the Dissidents, promised a thousand combatants, but it was doubtful if they could muster six hundred, though the latter embraced all the Communists in Paris. To these we must add four or five hundred old conspirators, whom the first musket-shot would recall to their old standards, and fifteen hundred Polish, Italian, and Spanish refugees, who would probably do the same, from the idea that it would advance the cause of revolution in their own countries. In all, four thousand in Paris, and that was the very utmost that could be relied upon in the capital. In the provinces, there was only one real secret society, which was at Lyons; Marseilles, Toulouse, and two or three other great towns professed to have such, but no reliance could be placed on them. On the whole, there might be fifteen or sixteen thousand Republicans in the departments, and four thousand in Paris. In all, nineteen or twenty thousand out of seventeen millions of male inhabitants, a proportion so infinitely small, that it is evident they could never have overturned a strong Government."*

* Histoire des Sociétés Secrètes.

The discrepancy between this calculation and the statement made by a sanguine member of the party at the Réforme office requires some comment. Experience has shown that political enthusiasts are very apt to overrate the strength of their party ; but, without disputing the accuracy of Delahodde's details, it will be admitted by those who have had any experience in political organisation, that the number of men enrolled in an association affords no criterion of the number of those holding the principles of that association. Scores read, think, and express their opinions in private for one who takes a more active part in a political agitation. I will give an instance. In 1848, there were in Croydon about a dozen enrolled Chartists, and in the village of Carshalton none ; yet the petition for the scheme of Parliamentary Reform known as the People's Charter was signed in the former place by two thousand men, and in the latter by two hundred, and I am able to testify to the genuineness of every signature.

On the morning of the 21st, the banquet committee announced that the celebration would take place on the following day, and that the procession would be formed on the Place de la Madeleine, and proceed through the Place de la Concorde and the Champs Elysées to the place where the banquet was to be held. This announcement had no sooner appeared than Delessert, the prefect of police, issued a proclamation forbidding the demonstration ; and, the subject being brought before the Chamber of Deputies by Odillon-Barrot, Duchâtel, the Minister of the Interior, declared it to be the firm determination of the Government to suppress the meeting by force, at all hazards.

The Opposition deputies thereupon issued a placard, announcing that, as the Government seemed bent on provoking a collision, they deemed it undesirable to make the intended demonstration, but would vindicate the rights of the people by every constitutional means.

During the night additional troops were brought into Paris, and immense supplies of ammunition were procured from Vincennes, and distributed among them at the barracks and the forts around the city. On the morning of the 22nd at least eighty thousand soldiers were assembled, and the command given to Marshal Bugeaud, a man of unrelenting ferocity of character. Undaunted by these preparations, thirty thousand men, chiefly of the working classes, assembled by noon at the appointed rendezvous, and marched in admirable order over the Pont de la Concorde, without being molested by police or troops. The day passed without any event more serious than some affrays between the populace who thronged the streets and the Municipal Guards, the few barricades that were erected not being defended, and seeming to be merely experimental. There was a dangerous amount of excitement developed, however, upon which the firing of a single shot would be likely to act like a spark upon a train of gunpowder.

On the 23rd the barricades were more numerous and better constructed, many gunsmiths' shops were broken open and pillaged, and several military posts were seized by small bands of armed men, without any serious resistance being offered by the defenders. The National Guards turned out at the call of the Government, but remained inactive, and in some instances interposed between the insurgents and the troops. The announcement of Guizot's resignation produced no other effect than a general fraternisation of soldiers, National Guards, and insurgents. But the crisis had arrived; the secret societies mustered in the evening on the Boulevard St.-Martin, and marched to the office of the National, where Marrast, the chief editor, addressed them, with impassioned eloquence, in favour of a Republic. They then united, near the Café Tortoni, with a body of uninitiated workmen, led by Lagrange, a mechanic of restless and fiery temperament, and proceeded towards the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, before which a troop of soldiers was drawn up, confronting a throng of persons of both sexes.

An incident then occurred which proved the signal for the insurrection, but which has been so variously related by different narrators of the event, even by persons who should have been well informed, that it is impossible to regard any version of the affair with confidence. By some the soldiers are said to have fired, without warning, upon the unarmed throng; by others Lagrange is said to have provoked the volley by firing a pistol at the officer in command; while a third version represents a shot to have been fired by some unknown person, supposed to have been an agent of the secret police, in order to afford a pretext for a massacre, in the hope of inspiring the masses with terror. All that can be regarded as certain is, that a shot was fired by some one, that the soldiers were then ordered to fire, and that the volley, at such short range, covered the pavement with dead and wounded men and women. Then, while the wounded were taken to the nearest hospitals, the corpses were placed in carts, and paraded through the streets by torchlight, causing a cry for vengeance to rise from every quarter of the city.

After a night of conflict and commotion, the pale February sun rose upon two thousand barricades and masses of armed men, thousands of whom were pledged to go through to the end with the work to which they had set themselves. The dotard King quaked, lost his head, and at one moment ordered the capital to be declared in a state of siege, at the next sent for Thiers and Odillon-Barrot, Count Molé having declined to take office at such a crisis. It was too late; the insurgents tore down the placards announcing the advent of the Liberals to office, and pressed on to seize post after post, with cries, now heard for the first time since the conflict commenced, of Vive la République! The announcement of Louis Philippe's abdication produced no more effect than the formation of the abortive Ministry of M. Thiers. The King and his family fled, the insurgents invaded the Chamber of Deputies, and the venerable Dupont, placed by the Liberal deputies in the President's chair, announced that Ledru-Rollin, Lamartine, Cremieux, Arago, Marie, Garnier-Pagès, and himself would constitute a Provisional Government.

The selection had previously been made at a meeting of the leading Liberal deputies at the office of the National, and another selection had been made at the office of the Réforme, substituting the names of Flocon and Louis Blanc for two of those in the other list. These gentlemen joined the others at the Hôtel de Ville, where also Marrast and Bastide presently arrived. The clamour of the immense throng assembled on the Place de Grève rendered a prolonged consultation undesirable, and the list was hastily settled, and read to the crowd from the steps of the historically famous edifice assigned to the Provisional Government by the Chamber. The name of Garnier-Pagès was struck out from the list read in the Chamber, and the names of Carnot, Bethmont, Sabervie, and Goudchaux added, to fill all the departments ; and those of Marrast, Flocon, Louis Blanc, and Paquerre were appended as secretaries.

Some of the names on the list were scarcely known to the masses, who received with acclamations only that of Ledru-Rollin, demanded the addition of Albert to the list, and murmured at the subordinate position assigned to Flocon and Louis Blanc. While the Provisional Government were consoling Garnier-Pagès with the mayoralty of Paris, assigning Buchez and Recurt to him as subordinates, and nominating General Courtais to the command of the National Guards, and Etienne Arago to the direction of the Post-office, the crowd remained on the Place de Grève, threatening to become tumultuous. Flocon and Louis Blanc moved amongst the surging throng, endeavouring to preserve order ; but discontent became more strongly manifested every moment, and threatening cries reached the apartment in which the members of the Provisional Government were assembled.

Lamartine, Cremieux, and Marie successively addressed the throng from a window, using sounding phrases of much vagueness ; but the tumult increased, until at length shots were fired at the windows, and a rush was made into the building. The members of the Provisional Government barricaded themselves in their council-room, and Lamartine with some difficulty led the mob into the public hall, where he again addressed them amidst much uproar, his vague and diffuse utterances being regarded as very unsatisfactory. The announcement that the Government would be Republican at length appeased the crowd, which separated with shouts of Vive la République ! Vive le Gouvernement Provisoire !

The prefecture of police was offered to Baune, who declined it, and suggested that it should be given to Caussidière ; and this nomination being supported by Flocon, the chief of the Seasons received the appointment, accepting it, as he says, with some reluctance, and with the intention of resigning it as soon as the Government should be settled. He was accompanied to the prefecture by five or six thousand armed insurgents, and prepared with zeal and energy to execute the arduous duties of his office. It being rumoured that the insurgents who accompanied him bivouacked around the prefecture, and intended to contest the authority of the Provisional Government, Lamartine had an interview with him, and returned to the Hôtel de Ville with the conviction that he was a man of the strictest integrity, and whose tact and influence would be useful to the Government.

Barbès and Blanqui, with other political prisoners, had the doors of their prison opened by the revolution. Gratitude impelled the former to wait immediately upon Lamartine, who found in him "the instincts of an exalted mind and an honest heart, combined with a disposition to promote conciliatory and moderate views among the people." Louis Blanc speaks of him as "a man who never compromised with justice, who never bent to power, who never retreated before danger, who was never moved in the presence of death, and who is in the ordinary affairs of life a person of such gentleness of character, and so engaging in his intercourse, that it is impossible to approach him without loving him."* This is the testimony of all who knew him, and it is confirmed by every feature of his noble and expressive countenance. Shortly after his liberation he was elected colonel of the twelfth legion of the National Guards, and founded the Club of the Revolution, among the members of which were Martin Bernard, Etienne and Emmanuel Arago, Thoré, Proudhon, Pierre Leroux, Bac, and Greppo, an artisan, who was subsequently a member of the National Assembly.

Blanqui founded the Central Club, Raspail the Friends of the People, Grandmesnil the Club of Rights and Duties, Cabet another. Between Blanqui and his former colleagues a feeling of distrust soon arose. Some secret documents were abstracted from the archives of the Ministry of the Interior, and one of them, relating to the Seasons, fell into the hands of M. Taschereau, who published it in the Revue Rétrospective. It bore no signature, but was evidently the production of an intelligent and educated man, who was fully acquainted with the organisation of the Society and with the men who composed it. The publication of the report created a great sensation among those who had been members of the Society, and Blanqui was very generally suspected of having made the disclosures contained in it while under sentence of death, in order to save his head. Much of the information could have been given only by five persons—namely, Barbès, Blanqui, Bernard, Raisan, and Lamieussens. Permission was obtained to examine the manuscript, but the handwriting could not be recognised. It was afterwards ascertained, however, that the original document was copied before it passed into the hands of M. Taschereau by Lalande, formerly secretary to the Chamber of Peers.

Barbès was so fully convinced that the statement must have emanated from Blanqui that he wrote to him, demanding an explanation. Blanqui withdrew from his club for a few days, and wrote a reply, which he circulated among the initiated. It did not prove entirely satisfactory to the majority, but he returned to his club, and his special adherents again rallied to him. He was a poor man, and, unknown beyond his club, lived a solitary and obscure life. Superior to Barbès in both tact and talent, he was generally credited with less integrity, and supposed to be influenced more by policy than by principle. Hence he was suspected equally by the clubs and the Provisional Government.

Another revolutionary reputation that was ruined by discoveries made after and through the revolution was that of Delahodde. Caussidière, examining with a very natural curiosity the archives of the prefecture of police, found many reports on the secret societies signed Pierre, and, proceeding in his research, came upon a letter in the same handwriting, but signed L. Delahodde. It was dated 1838, and contained an application for admission into the secret police, the writer giving the following account of himself:—

“Like many young men, I have been the victim of that political exaltation which so sadly signalised the first years of the Revolution of July. In 1832 I was introduced to the Society of the Rights of Man. Shortly afterwards I entered the army as a volunteer; I entered the 38th Regiment of the Line, and I acquired a certain celebrity by representing, at the theatre of Soissons, a play in which there were political allusions, an act which my superior officers punished very severely. I was afterwards brought to trial at Laon, but I must protest that the political charges brought against me were without foundation. The verdict of the jury proved that. The sort of reputation which I acquired from these two circumstances placed me in connexion with the principal leaders of the Republican party. I was looked upon as all-powerful in the regiment, and M. Marrast, of the Tribune, endeavoured at various times to persuade me to attempt a demonstration, which he said would shake the whole army.

“I left the army in 1835, and passed one year in Paris, studying the law. At this period I was made a member of the Society of the Families, about which I could give some information, if required. I then returned home, and it was then that it struck me that I had too long allowed myself to be the instrument of men, most of whom were ambitious, or of disappointed expectations, and the remainder men who had run wild, and wished to induce others to follow their example; and I forswore the principles of blood and destruction which I had once had the folly to adopt.

Daily contact with men of the world and my own experience have since dissipated many of my youthful illusions, and it is because of this rapid descent from belief in appearances that I shall be enabled to shake off from the employment that I solicit those prejudices which surround it."

Caussidière communicated his discovery of Delahodde's treachery to Grandmesnil, Chenu, Albert, and others who knew the man, and were affected by his denunciations; and they assembled at his house, to the number of sixteen, the traitor being also invited. He met them unsuspectingly, but their stern countenances, and the gravity of the manner in which Grandmesnil was voted to the chair, and Caussidière made his accusation, soon undeceived him as to the situation. He at first denied the charge, but, on his letter being read, he confessed that he had been a member of the secret police since 1838, and that all the reports signed Pierre had been written by him, but endeavoured to extenuate his guilt by pleading that he had never been an agent provocateur, and had never arrested a Republican. The assembly became excited, and it was proposed that Delahodde should expiate his offence by shooting himself; but it was ultimately resolved that he should make his confession in writing, and sign it. This was done, and a procès-verbal of the proceedings was drawn up, and signed by every one present. He was then allowed to retire, but was immediately afterwards arrested by order of Caussidière on the charge of having, subsequently to the revolution, corresponded with agents of Louis Philippe. He was committed to the Conciergerie upon this charge, but liberated after the resignation of Caussidière, and then went to London.

Caussidière had reorganised the police and formed the Republican Guards, a body of three or four thousand men, into which those only were admitted who had suffered imprisonment for political offences under the monarchy, fought in the ranks of the insurrection of February, or left the army with a good character. Amongst those who joined this force was Chenu, who had been one of the leaders of the Dissidents, and had sat in judgment upon Delahodde, but who was now discovered to have also been a member of the secret police. On being detected and denounced he made an abject confession, and begged to be allowed to return to Belgium, of which country he was a native, promising that he would henceforth live honestly by his trade of shoemaking. He was allowed to go, but it was soon discovered that he had returned to Paris, and had held threatening language concerning Caussidière, who thereupon ordered his arrest. Again liberated, on denouncing some of his fellow-spies, who were still in Paris, he went to Germany; but after the election of Buonaparte to the Presidency he again returned, and afterwards obtained employment once more in the secret police.

The relations between the Provisional Government and the men holding subordinate appointments were not free from distrust on both sides. The former suspected the latter of designs against the Government; the latter suspected their chiefs of being lukewarm or adverse towards the Republic. Caussidière's appointment was not officially announced until the 13th of March, and only after repeated complaints from him to Ledru-Rollin that he could not perform the duties of his office satisfactorily while his position was undetermined. Albert, who had been nominated with Louis Blanc to preside over the committee of workmen at the Luxembourg, complained that he was coolly and superciliously treated by the Provisional Government, and talked of resigning. The constant language of the clubs was that the people ought to have guarantees in the composition of the Provisional Government for the honest reduction to practice of a truly Republican system.

This feeling was undoubtedly the mainspring of the movement of the 17th of March, when the clubs went in procession to the Hôtel de Ville, and a numerous deputation, including Barbès, Blanqui, Raspail, Cabet, Sobrier, Flotte, Lacambre, Michelot, and others, demanded the postponement of the elections and the removal of the regular troops from the capital. Ledru-Rollin replied, giving the deputation no encouragement, and was followed by Lamartine in the same sense. Blanqui, who was the spokesman of the deputation, was urged by his immediate supporters to be firm; but before he could speak a young man stepped to the front and demanded, amidst the applause of the deputation, the immediate decision of the Government. Cremieux, Marie, and Dupont spoke in succession, refusing to decide without deliberation; and then, as the deputation seemed disinclined to retire, Lamartine spoke again, exhorting the clubbists to have confidence in the Government. Several delegates replied that they had confidence in some of its members, but not in all of them. Cabet then made a conciliatory speech, and Barbès and Raspail having expressed their approval of its sentiments, the deputation withdrew, and conveyed to the throng on the Place de Grève the result of the interview.

Between this date and the movement of the 16th of April the air was filled with vague rumours of plots, sometimes said to be directed against the Government, sometimes against its more popular members. One day it was rumoured that Ledru-Rollin had been arrested, another that Louis Blanc had been assassinated, that Blanqui's club had resolved to seize the members of the Provisional Government in their beds, and set up the dictatorship of their chief. Caussidière attributed these sinister rumours to men whose republicanism dated from the 24th of February, and who desired to discredit the democratic party, but they were never traced to their source.

Blanqui's position was equivocal. Lamartine says that the Government suspected his designs, and suggested his arrest; Caussidière states that he wished to close Blanqui's club, considering it dangerous to public order, but was told by Flotte that Blanqui was on excellent terms with Lamartine, and often visited him. It would seem from Lamartine's statement that Blanqui was screened by Ledru-Rollin, but Caussidière was told by Flotte that Ledru-Rollin refused to see Blanqui when the latter requested an interview. Lamartine admits only one interview with Blanqui, which he dates towards the end of March; but he was in constant communication with Flotte, through whom that interview was arranged. He admits that he offered Blanqui a post abroad, which was not declined, and that they parted perfectly satisfied with each other.

What really passed between Lamartine and Blanqui on that occasion will perhaps never be known. It is hardly satisfactory to be told by the former only that Blanqui acquiesced in his views, and that they were mutually satisfied. It is important, however, that Lamartine antedates the interview, which was shown by the evidence of General Courtais, Flotte, and other witnesses examined before the High Court of Bourges, when Blanqui was on his trial for treason, to have taken place on the evening of the 15th of April.

“At that time,” said Lamartine, in his evidence, “I was not acquainted with Citizen Blanqui. The strong prejudice against him, which produced its effect a little later, was shared, to a certain extent, by me. I knew Citizen Blanqui only as a man of remarkable character and intelligence. I happened to be acquainted with Citizen Flotte, a retired naval officer, who was intimate with Blanqui, and, I believe, a member of his club. I begged him frankly to tell me without reservation what he thought of Blanqui; if so fine an intelligence were not weary of bloody revolutions, and of being condemned to be incessantly whirling in the vortex of agitation. Flotte replied that I was under a serious misapprehension, that Blanqui was animated by the best feelings, of which I could easily convince myself by an interview with him. A few days afterwards Citizen Blanqui came to see me, and with a smile on his face; I went up to him, and, giving him my hand, said, in allusion to the absurd reports spread by the newspapers, ‘Well, Citizen Blanqui, have you come to assassinate me?’ I took him into my study, where we had a conversation which lasted three hours, of the most interesting kind on the part of M. Blanqui. We passed in review every matter of serious import that was then engaging attention. I feel it right to say that upon all these points—property, the family, the necessity for a strong and undivided Government, the necessity of concentrating all power in the National Assembly, and of respecting, and enforcing respect to, the National Assembly, the result of universal suffrage, the expression of the popular will—I was happy to hear from Citizen Blanqui sound ideas brilliantly expressed. The result of this conversation was to leave upon me a favourable impression, and to inspire me with just esteem for the intentions and character of Citizen Blanqui.”

The movement of the 16th of April is involved in some mystery, after all that has been written concerning it by Lamartine, Louis Blanc, and Caussidière. According to the ex-Minister, whose version has generally been accepted, the object of the demonstration was to overawe the Government, and procure the substitution of certain popular leaders for Dupont, Marie, Marrast, and himself; but this view is not easily reconciled with the fact of the interview of Blanqui with him on the preceding evening, his subsequent attempt to antedate that interview by at least three weeks, and the prominent part which Blanqui took in the demonstration. Louis Blanc denies that the movement was directed against the Government, and Caussidière calls the 16th of April “a day of dupes,” and hints that it was an insidious attempt to injure the repute and influence of the democratic leaders.

It is certain that a large number of men, directed by a fugleman who wore green spectacles, shouted A bas les Communistes! without ceasing as the procession passed; and Caussidière states that he asked one of these men why he uttered that cry, and that the man became confused, admitted that he had been employed to utter it, and then shuffled away into the crowd. On the following day, too, many persons, chiefly workmen, were arrested; and, as an example of the charges against them, it is said that Flotte was one of a group who were reading a placard, and, refusing to move on when ordered by a gendarme, was marched off to prison.

The elections placed in the National Assembly many of the leaders of the secret societies, including Barbès, Bernard, Baune, Buchez, Caussidière, Flocon, Albert, the Aragos, Greppo, and Lagrange. The Assembly met on the 4th of May, and on the 15th occurred that deplorable event, the invasion of the hall of sitting by an armed multitude, which accelerated the fall of the Republic. Caussidière, whom Lamartine acquits of any participation in the plot, received on the evening of the 14th a note from Buchez, warning him that a disturbance might be expected on the morrow from the demonstration in favour of French intervention on behalf of Poland; but he was rendered incapable of personal action at the time by an accidental injury from a horse, and, apprehending nothing serious, contented himself with directing a number of his most trusted men to join the procession and assist in maintaining order.

On the following morning he was informed that Blanqui and his followers had paraded on the Boulevard du Temple, and were said to be armed with pistols; but, receiving no other sinister reports, he wrote to Buchez, who had been elected President of the Assembly, stating that no danger was to be apprehended, unless from Blanqui's party. The demonstration took place, and the processionists penetrated into the hall of the Assembly, where, amidst tremendous confusion, a new Provisional Government was nominated, to consist, according to Lamartine, of Louis Blanc, Barbès, Albert, Blanqui, Raspail, Proudhon, Leroux, Cabet, Sobrier, and Huber. Other accounts give the names of Ledru-Rollin and Flocon, and omit those of Proudhon, Leroux, Cabet, and Sobrier; and Caussidière states that a mob came to the Prefecture of Police, the leaders of which announced that he was nominated a member of the new Government, and requested him to go to the Hôtel de Ville. Caussidière refused, and the Prefecture was cleared by the police.

As soon as the National Guards could be mustered, the hall of the Assembly was cleared of the mob, and an order signed by Ledru-Rollin and Lamartine for the arrest of Barbès and Albert, who had been the most active leaders of the émeute. The Guards marched immediately to the Hôtel de Ville, and, after a brief affray with the insurgents, arrested both the incriminated men. Caussidière, as soon as he was aware of what had happened, presented himself to the Government, and being accused of negligence in the performance of his duty, retorted with a complaint of the manner in which he had been prevented from effectually performing it by the remissness of the Government. After some deliberation he was informed that the Government would retain his services; but on the following day a decree for the disbandment of the Republican Guard appeared, and he saw that he was more than ever distrusted.

Lamartine states that Caussidière was deprived of his office for failing to maintain order on the 15th; but though resignation had been suggested to him, it seems clear that he left the presence of the Ministers with the impression that his tenure of office was continued. On the 17th, however, a large military force, including artillery, under the command of General Bedeau, invested the Prefecture, and he was summoned to surrender. He refused, and went to the Government for an explanation. They urged him to resign, but he refused, and returned to the Prefecture. Lamartine followed, and succeeded in inducing him to give up the Prefecture and authorise the announcement of his resignation.

“It had always,” he says, “been my real and sincere intention to keep aloof from all the trammels of place. For seventeen years I had been one of the foremost in the breach, without any ulterior views of personal advantage. I may honestly say that I made every possible sacrifice to my cause. The realisation and adoption of my political principles were in my eyes the noblest recompense.”

On the same day orders were given for the arrest of Blanqui, Sobrier, and Huber; but Lamartine is said to have made such strenuous efforts to protect Blanqui that the warrant was recalled in his case, and it was only by the representations of his colleagues of the injustice of making a distinction in favour of one of the accused who was as guilty as the others that his opposition was overcome, and the warrant again placed in the hands of the police. Sobrier and Huber had already been arrested, and followed Barbès and Albert to the fortress of Vincennes, where they were soon joined by Blanqui.

Subsequently, when the suppression of the June insurrection had given increased confidence to the reactionists, Caussidière and Louis Blanc were accused of complicity in the plot, and though they were ably and earnestly defended by Flocon and Bac, the National Assembly, rejecting by four hundred and fifty-eight votes against two hundred and eighty-one the demand for the authorisation of their trial by a military commission, resolved that they should be prosecuted by a majority of four hundred and seventy-seven against two hundred and sixty-eight.

It was five o'clock in the morning when the Assembly rose on this occasion, and no steps were taken for the immediate arrest of the accused. Caussidière, before leaving, asked General Cavaignac whether he was to be arrested at once, and, though the reply left the matter in doubt, he gathered from it that there was no anxiety on the part of the Government to secure him. Both the accused went home, therefore, and prepared for flight; and in the course of the next day they were both on their way to London.

Barbès, Albert, Blanqui, Sobrier, and Huber were not brought to trial before November, when they were arraigned before the High Court of Bourges, a tribunal not in existence at the time of their arrest; and, being all convicted, Barbès was sentenced to transportation for life, and the others to various terms of imprisonment. Bernard escaped the fate of his old associates until the following year, when he became implicated in the abortive movement of the 13th of June, and fled to London to avoid arrest. As for the rank and file of the secret societies, most of them perished during those terrible days of June when Buonapartist agents, provided with foreign gold, prepared the way for the Empire by swamping the Republic in the blood of the men by whom it had been established.

Blanqui, kept in involuntary inactivity, survived most of the men who had followed him to a prison or a bloody grave. The downfall of the Empire restored him, for a brief space, to personal freedom; but on the 16th of March, 1871, he was arrested—apparently as a measure of precaution—at a small town in the south of France, where he was confined to his bed by illness, and removed to Fort du Taurea, on the north coast, where he was kept in the strictest confinement until the following spring. During the civil struggle that followed the war the Communal Government proposed to M. Thiers, on two different occasions, the exchange of the Archbishop of Paris and the other hostages detained at Mazas for Blanqui alone; but the Versailles Government refused to liberate the latter, and thus sacrificed the only hope of saving the lives of the Archbishop and his companions in misfortune. In March, 1872, Blanqui was tried at Versailles by a court-martial for alleged participation in the movement of the 22nd of January, condemned to imprisonment for life, and sent to the prison of Clairvaux, where he died in February, 1876, in the seventy-second year of his age.

CHAPTER XIV.

YOUNG GERMANY.

THE idea of a democratic Holy Alliance, which Béranger embodied in one of his deathless lyrics and Lafayette hailed in that abortive scheme of Pepe's for a corresponding society for promoting the revolutionisation of Europe, seems to have been present to the mind of Mazzini when he directed the attention of the Central Committee of Young Italy to the expediency of "forging as many links as possible between the Italian and foreign democratic elements."* The organisation of Young Italy, and afterwards the preparation of the unfortunate expedition into Savoy, engaged all his thoughts and energies for some time, however, and it was not until the spring of 1834 that the idea fructified in the institution of Young Europe.

On the 15th of April, in that year, eighteen Italian, German, and Polish refugees assembled at Berne, under the presidency of Mazzini, and drew up a Pact of Fraternity, and instructions for its realisation. Young Europe was declared to be "an association of men believing in a future of liberty, equality, and fraternity, for all mankind; and desirous of consecrating their thoughts and actions to the realisation of that future. To constitute humanity in such wise as to enable it throughout a continuous progress to discover and apply the law of God by which it should be governed as speedily as possible: such is the mission of Young Europe. . . . Humanity will only be truly constituted when all the peoples of which it is composed have acquired the free exercise of their sovereignty, and shall be associated in a Republican Confederation, governed and directed by a common Declaration of Principles and a common Pact, towards the common aim—the discovery and fulfilment of the Universal Moral Law.”

“The ideal of the association of Young Europe,” says Mazzini, “was the federal organisation of European democracy under one sole direction; so that any nation rising in insurrection should at once find the others ready to assist it—if not by action, then at least by a moral support sufficiently powerful to prevent hostile intervention on the part of their Governments. We therefore decided to constitute a National Committee of each nation, around which all the elements of Republican progress might rally by degrees, and arranged that all these committees should be linked with our Central Provisional Committee of the Association, through the medium of a regular correspondence.

“We diffused secret rules for the affiliation of members, decided upon the form of oath to be taken, and chose as the common symbol an ivy leaf. In short, we took all the measures necessary for the formation of a secret association. I did not deceive myself, however, by an exaggerated conception of the extent or diffusion of the association, or imagine it possible that it should ever attain any compact force capable of being brought into action. I knew that it embraced too vast a sphere to allow of any practical results, and that much time and many severe lessons would be required in order to teach the peoples the necessity of a true European fraternity. My only aim, therefore, was to constitute an apostolate of ideas different from those then current, and to leave them to bear fruit how and where they might."

Young Europe, as a distinct Society, was represented by the Central Committee at Berne, which may be regarded as the head of the body of which the affiliated Societies of Young Italy, Young Germany, Young Poland, and Young Switzerland were the members. The first of these Societies was already constituted, and the Germans and Poles who had signed the Pact formed the nuclei of the kindred Associations of their respective nationalities.

The Savoy expedition had attracted the attention of foreign Governments to the proceedings of the refugees in Switzerland in such a degree that their every movement excited suspicion; and when, towards the close of 1835, one Lessing was assassinated by an unknown hand in the neighbourhood of Zurich, the official and semi-official journals of the German States at once pronounced the secret society, Young Germany, guilty of complicity in the crime, and added an accusation of collecting arms and preparing for a buccaneering invasion of Baden. To obtain evidence to support these charges, in order to found upon it a demand for the expulsion of the refugees, the Prussian, Austrian, and Russian Governments sent spies into Switzerland, one of whom, a German Jew, named Altinger, went so far as, under the falsely assumed title of Baron Eib, to enlist German workmen for some secret and mysterious enterprise, which was never undertaken. These devices not being attended with success, recourse was had to the sharper wits of the French secret police.

Circulars were sent to the refugees in France, in the name of Mazzini, desiring them to join him at Greuchen, in the Canton of Soleure, where he was then staying, and stating the object of the rendezvous to be an expedition into Baden. Mazzini alleged that this circular was concocted at the French Embassy at Berne, at the instigation of the Ambassadors of Austria, Prussia, and Russia, who were immediately instructed by their respective Governments to remonstrate with the Federal Council on the ground of its incendiary character. Mazzini, the Ruffinis, and a Danish gentleman, named Haring, were thereupon arrested, and taken to Soleure, where, after a detention of twenty-four hours, they were liberated, but ordered to quit the Canton. This edict had no other effect than the removal of Mazzini and his friends to Langenan, in the Canton of Berne.

The subject was shortly afterwards brought before the Swiss Diet by M. Chambrier, who informed that body, with a touch of unconscious satire, that "the Association styled Young Europe has taken for its motto the words Liberty, Equality, Humanity, and professes to be founded on the rights of man—the manifesto of France to Europe when it was covered with scaffolds. Its members are bound to contribute with all their strength to the destruction of established Governments in all countries; they would level everything to let in the flood of revolutionary ideas. Its act of association bears date, Berne, April the 19th, 1834. There also have successively arisen the other Societies, called Young Italy, Young Poland, Young Germany, Young France, and Young Switzerland. A directing committee, sitting at Paris, holds in its hands the threads of the different Associations which compose Young Europe. Separate committees are at the head of the different sections, but they all obey implicitly the orders of the unknown committee, which, shrouded in darkness, sits at Paris. Young Switzerland, established on the 26th of July, 1835, is entrusted with the task of organising the whole of Switzerland, overturning the Government in all the Cantons, annihilating the compact of 1815, preparing an appeal to arms, and organising, in conjunction with Young Germany, the free corps which are to revolutionise both countries. A province of Germany is to be immediately invaded, and all Europe stirred to support the movement."

M. Chambrier was in error as to the dates when the two Societies, Young Europe and Young Switzerland, had their origin, and also in the statement that the directing committee of the former was located in Paris. It had its seat in Berne until it was transferred to London, after the expulsion of the refugees from Switzerland. That event could not be long deferred. Switzerland, a small and poor country, could be subjected by her neighbours to an amount of coercion which would not have been ventured upon in the case of England, or even Turkey. The Duke of Montebello menaced the Government with suspension of diplomatic relations, and holding Switzerland responsible for the results of any plots that might be formed on her soil against France; and the demand for the expulsion of the refugees was at length complied with.

This measure had very little effect upon the organisation of Young Germany, most of the members of that Society being workmen who moved frequently from one town to another, and thus failed to attract observation. The Swiss Government concerned itself only with the refugees named by the Ambassadors of the remonstrating Powers, and the nucleus of the Society remained unbroken. The number of members increased considerably during 1836, chiefly through the exertions of a body of propagandists, one or two of whom were attached to each branch of the Society, and who formed a secret committee unknown to the members generally, to influence the operations and, as I find it expressed in a private letter, "to keep up the steam."

I have not succeeded in procuring a copy of the oath taken by the members of this Society; but its substance may be gathered from the rules, which set forth that the Society was essentially and necessarily a secret one, its end being political propagandism. Every member obliged himself to remain in the Association until he attained the age of forty, to devote all his powers to the attainment of its aims, and to make whatever sacrifices might be necessary to that end. Every member engaged himself to destroy all written documents by which the Association, or any member of it, might be traced. The Central Committee remained at Berne, conducting the movement and corresponding with members in Germany, to which.

country some of them were frequently returning, and in that way diffusing the principles of the Association within the borders of the Fatherland.

In 1837 the Society suffered from a schism similar to that which, at a later period, occurred in the Families. Many of the members imbibed the Communistic principles then being disseminated among the German workmen by Wilhelm Weitling, and seceded from the Society to join the secret society of Communists, then beginning to spread its network of clubs over Switzerland. Several discussions were held in Geneva and other large towns on the subject of those principles, and resulted in a modification of Young Germany's declaration of principles, and a growing tendency on the part of the members to occupy themselves with those social questions which they began to perceive must demand the attention of statesmen whenever the masses succeeded in acquiring political power.

The diminution of numerical strength arising from the Communist secession, and the greater attraction which Weitling's programme had for many minds, kept Young Germany in a stationary position for a time; but between the years 1840 and 1845 it was gradually extended among the German workmen in Switzerland, the number of whom at the latter period was estimated at twenty-five thousand. Then commenced a period of increased activity, under the auspices of a new committee, the members of which were a literary gentleman named Marr, a couple of teachers of the German language named Standau and Doclecke, and a druggist named Hoffman—all resident at Lausanne, where the Society had then its headquarters. Dr. Tein, an ex-member of the central committee, had been arrested and imprisoned at Lucerne, on the charge of participation in the civil war of the preceding year; and another, Dr. Rauschenplatt, had found it convenient to remove to Strasburg to avoid the like fate on the same account.

Branches of the Society existed at this time in twenty-six towns of the Swiss cantons—namely, Geneva, Carouge, Nyon, Rolle, Aubonne, Aigle, Morges, Lausanne, Vevay, Yverdon, Moudon, Payerne, Friburg, La Chaux-de-Fonds, Fleunès, Berne, Bielle, St. Imier, Porentruy, Burgdorf, Basle, Lucerne, Zurich, Winterthur, Zug, and Chur. Delegates from all the branches assembled half-yearly in one of the larger towns, which then became the seat of the Central Committee for the following six months. Each branch elected a committee, which directed its proceedings, prepared topics for discussion by the members, and corresponded with the committees in other towns as well as with the central committee. The strongest branches were those of Geneva, Lausanne, Berne, Zurich, and La Chaux-de-Fonds—the last, though only a small town, having a society of two hundred members. These had libraries and news-rooms, and also music-rooms, provided with a piano-forte.

Dr. Rauschenplatt succeeded in founding a branch of the Society at Strasburg, and there was another in existence at Marseilles. In Germany branches had been formed at Stuttgart, Carlsruhe, Darmstadt, and probably some other towns. Germany's greatest living poet, Ferdinand Freiligrath, was an active member, and celebrated his admission into the Society in a charming little poem, in which the incident is hinted at with a delicacy that would convey the fact only to the initiated. In Germany, however, the Society made its way very slowly at first, owing to the stringent measures of the various Governments, which influenced even the more cautious Germans in Switzerland.

“We are obliged,” says a letter from the Zurich committee to the central committee, “to use great caution, on account of most of the newly-arriving men being frightened by the ordinances and intimidations of the German Governments. They will never enter a club unless they are told that it is not a political one. Thus we are obliged to treat them very cautiously, to bring them step by step into the right road, and the principal thing in this respect is to show them that religion is nothing but a pile of rubbish. The only thing we can do here is to prepare them for the clubs in French Switzerland; and there we send those who intend leaving Zurich.”

Many were the devices used to procure the adhesion of the German workmen in any town where a branch had been established. Thus, at Morges there were many whitesmiths of that nationality, and not a single member of that trade belonged to the local branch of Young Germany. The usual plan of using one man to bring over his fellow-craftsmen could not, therefore, be resorted to; but the committee, finding from its correspondence, that a German whitesmith had been initiated at Lausanne, induced the man to take up his abode at Morges, where he succeeded in procuring the adhesion of most of his compatriots of his own trade.

Wilhelm Marr edited the journal of the Society, named after it, and having a circulation of over five hundred, chiefly among the Germans in Switzerland. He was plain-speaking and earnest, as journalists always are when they are working for the dissemination of their own political creed, with a great end in view, and are little influenced by considerations of profit, or the views of a proprietary. "Germany," he said in the first number of the journal, "needs a thorough revolution—political, religious, and social; and, if politics and religion should, in its course, end in smoke, so much the better: socialised man will come out of the purgation purer and better." In the autumn of 1845 he made a propagandist tour through Germany, but was arrested at Leipzig, and ordered to quit the country.

That Marr was well acquainted with the under-current of thought among the workmen of Germany was shown by the views which came to the surface a few years later. There had long been growing in the minds of Germans of all classes a feeling in favour of the union of the whole nation under one head; and the masses, uniting their aspirations to political power with their longings for national unity, desired to see this idea realised in a common Diet, in which the entire German people should be represented. The religious world of Germany was agitated by the preaching of Ronge and Czernski, who, beginning with denouncing the corruptions of the Romish Church, were advancing rapidly in the development of a Religion of Humanity. The social theories of Cabet, and Proudhon, and Weitling were at the same time making progress among the masses, and threatening changes even greater than the unification of the people.

“While the middle classes of Germany kill their time with German Catholicity and Protestant Reform,” said a German, writing to a friend in London in 1845; “while they run after Ronge, and play the ‘Friends of Light,’ thus making it their chief business to effect some little, almost invisible, good-for-nothing (but a bourgeois) reform in religious matters, the working people of our country read and digest the writings of the greatest German philosophers, such as Feuerbach, &c., and embrace the result of their inquiries, as radical as this result may be.”

Though the press was shackled by the censorship, and public meetings could be held only by permission of the authorities, the idea of German unity continued to grow, and found expression through various channels. When laws prevent the free communication of ideas from mind to mind, the slightest hint or allusion acquires a significance which it would not possess under other conditions. A few lines of half-veiled allusion to national unity in the journal conducted at Leipzig by Robert Blum, and some bolder expressions of the feeling in the songs of Freiligrath, and Herwegh, and Hoffman, with letters from refugee or emigrant Germans in England and Switzerland, were the aliment by which the movement was sustained. These had a wider field in which to operate than the organ of Young Germany, which had a very limited circulation, and represented only the Republicans.

The French Revolution of 1848 produced a sudden excitement among the German refugees and emigrants, who, from London and Paris, and Strasburg and Marseilles, and all the towns of Switzerland, made their way into Germany during the first month after the throne of Louis Philippe had fallen. On the 26th of March a great popular demonstration took place at Heidelberg, where no fewer than thirty thousand men assembled amidst the elevated ruins of the ancient castle, overlooking the valley of the Neckar, and a series of eloquent addresses were delivered on the present and the future of the country. There Young Germany first found an articulate voice, and Hecker indicated the French Revolution as the example to be followed. His utterances evoked less enthusiasm than those of the Constitutional leaders, however, and the conclusions arrived at by the meeting were so far opposed to the realisation of the views of Young Germany, that the Central Committee called the initiated to arms, and the flag of the Society was raised by Hecker and Struve in the Grand Duchy of Baden.

On the 20th of April the insurgents were attacked and defeated near Raudern by General Gagern, who was mortally wounded in the encounter by a musket-ball. Struve was taken prisoner, and confined in the fortress of Rastadt; but Hecker escaped into Switzerland. The failure of the movement convinced the leaders of Young Germany that the masses were not yet prepared to fight for a Republic, and that they could, for the present, only watch the course of events. "The eyes of all Germans," says a private letter written towards the end of the summer, "are fixed upon the deputies who are engaged at Frankfort in the elaboration of a Constitution for united Germany, not yet united, nor likely to be. Nothing can be done until the nation's eyes are opened by the collapse of that enormous bubble, which the self-deluded believers in the alliance of kings and peoples has set floating in the summer sky, and which they gaze at with complacency, while princes and statesmen laugh in their sleeves at the gullibility of the people and their leaders. Can any man with brains in his head suppose that the conclusion will be other than a miserable fiasco? I suppose there are such dotards, but I believe that most of the men assembled at Frankfort are beginning to doubt whether the Constitution they are framing will ever come into operation. When the bubble bursts, there will be an outburst of rage on the part of the deluded and disappointed people, and the inevitable exposure of royal treachery and duplicity may open their eyes to the necessity of self-dependence, which must lead to a democratic Republic."

With a view to the operations to be undertaken when the way had been cleared by the anticipated bursting of the Frankfort bubble, a Congress of representatives of German democracy, including the leaders of Young Germany, was convened at Berlin in the autumn, when a series of resolutions was adopted, constituting a declaration of principles far in advance of the original objects of Young Germany, as defined by the Berne Committee in 1834. These resolutions were embodied in a manifesto, a printed copy of which reached me at the time, and is as follows:—

"1. The soil is the collective property of mankind. No individual has a right to property in the soil. He who cultivates it has a right to as much of the produce as he and his family require for the supply of their wants; the rest belongs to the community, all labour being social, not individual.

“ 2. Property is not an individual, but a social, right. Modern private property is the result of production based upon the antagonism of classes and the subjection of man to man. When the war of the worker and the master is finished, and then only, will the Revolution be completed; property will then cease to be private, and become social.

“ 3. All men have a right to the full satisfaction of their physical and intellectual wants. There is but one condition in which there can be no privileges with respect to material things.

“ 4. It is the duty of all to increase the social wealth by their labour and talents. He who does not work has no right to satisfy his wants. The producer alone can claim to be a consumer.

“ These principles being established, the following consequences will ensue :—

“ 1. All seignorial properties, all mines belonging to companies, &c., will be declared the property of the State, to be worked by the best appliances, and according to the methods most approved by science. The proprietors will be indemnified by an annuity of four per cent. for twenty years.

“ 2. The farmers will pay rent to the State. The proprietors, who are neither farmers nor labourers, have no share in the production, and therefore no right to the produce.

“ 3. Private banks will be replaced by State banks.

Paper money being used instead of gold or silver, it will regulate credit for all parties, and unite the conservative middle classes to the Revolution.

“ 4. All means of transit, roads, railways, canals, &c., will become the property of the State.

“ 5. The law of inheritance will be restricted.

“ 6. All taxes on articles of consumption will be abolished, and a system of direct taxation introduced.

“ 7. Functionaries will not be paid according to their grade, but according to their requirements. This law may be modified twenty-five years after the establishment of the Republic.

“ 8. The Church will be entirely separated from the State. Each parish will pay its own clergy.

“ 9. Justice will be gratuitous.

“ 10. Education will be gratuitous.

“ 11. All will be compelled to labour. There will be no idle standing army, for the military will be industrial. The army will produce as well as consume. This will be a means for the organisation of labour.

“ 12. National manufactories may be established. The State will guarantee the subsistence of all who work, and take care of those who are incapable of working.”

The collapse of the Frankfort scheme, the results of which were so hopefully awaited by the people, came in the following spring, as the Republicans had anticipated; and the popular conviction that the Federal Diet had recognised the Constituent Assembly only for the purpose of allaying the excitement of 1848, and with the intention of repudiating its conclusions when they were ripe for execution, produced a dangerous ferment. On the 13th of May a popular demonstration took place at Offenburg, in Baden, at which the conduct of the Prussian Government, in refusing to recognise the results of the deliberations at Frankfort, was vehemently denounced, and a proposal made to levy military execution upon Prussian territory. At Carlsruhe the troops evinced symptoms of insubordination; at Bruchsal the establishment of a Republic was advocated by members of Young Germany, and, on some arrests being made in consequence, a tumult ensued, and the prisoners were forcibly liberated by a riotous mob. The attitude of the people became more and more hostile to the Government of the Grand Duke, and he left Carlsruhe, and took up his residence at Hagenau until the tide of revolt had receded.

The movement extended into the Bavarian territory westward of the Rhine, and Provisional Governments were set up simultaneously at Carlsruhe and Kaiserslautern. Between these bodies a military convention was concluded, and energetic measures adopted for defence against that armed resistance to revolt which the King of Prussia had offered to all his brother kings and kinglings who might need it, as an encouragement to them to join him in repudiating the Constitution elaborated at Frankfort. The insurgent districts of Bavaria being separated from the rest of the kingdom by Baden and Wurtemberg, the King availed of Frederick William's offer, and a Prussian force was despatched to them under the command of General Weber. On the 13th of June the insurgents were attacked near Homburg, a town ten miles south-west from Kaiserslautern, and sustaining a defeat, retreated into the natural fastnesses of the Vosges. General Weber did not pursue them, but directed his march towards the seat of the Provisional Government.

On the approach of the Prussian troops the directors of the movement retired to Neustadt, a town eighteen miles to the south-east. On the following day a division of the Prussian army marched to Kirchheim, and encountered a body of insurgents, who fell back upon Mannheim; while another division, after some skirmishing, attacked Frankenthal, drove out the insurgents, and occupied both that town and Oygersheim. Mieroslowski, a Polish refugee, and a man of considerable military skill, had now had his offer of service accepted by the directors of the movement, and the warlike operations of the insurgents began to be conducted with more system. Ludwigshafen, opposite Mannheim, was strongly entrenched; and the Polish leader, being invested with the command, put himself at the head of the main body of the insurgents in Baden.

On the 15th, Mieroslowski attacked one of the Prussian divisions which was marching towards Wernheim; but though his forces were numerically superior to those of the enemy, suffered a repulse, and was compelled to fall back. On the same day the other division stormed the entrenchments at Ludwigshafen, forcing the defenders to evacuate the place and retreat southward, along the left bank of the Rhine. Prince William of Prussia (now Emperor of Germany) then assumed the command of the Prussian forces, and issued a proclamation, threatening with death all who opposed him. The insurgents still kept the field, however, and on the 22nd the division of General Hannehen was attacked by Mieroslawski at the village of Waghausel, where a severe engagement took place. The Prussian troops stood firm, and the arrival of reinforcements, numbering six or seven thousand, decided the conflict in their favour.

Mieroslawski retreated into the forests bordering the Neckar, whence he soon issued, however, showing as bold a front as before. Encountered by the Prussians near Ettlingen, and again defeated, he led his broken forces across the Murg in good order, and shut himself up with them in the fortified town of Rastadt. Prince William immediately surrounded the place with his forces, and his cannon soon compelled a surrender. Mieroslawski and many of his followers escaped, but hundreds of them were less fortunate, and the ramparts of the fortress echoed for weeks afterwards the reports of the volleys by which the captured insurgents were hurried out of the world.

Those volleys were the knell of German liberty and unity for eighteen years, during which it was dangerous to speak or write of matters which the King of Prussia had, in 1848, declared to be those upon which he had most set his mind and heart. Many of those who escaped the bullets of Prince William were arrested wherever they were found, and immured in the cells of Rastadt and Spandau. Others succeeded in getting beyond the frontier, and found a refuge in London. Professor Kinkel, arrested for the boldness of his comments on the conduct of Frederick William and his Ministers, was liberated from Spandau by a well-contrived scheme of escape, planned and executed by Carl Schurz, one of the fugitives of Rastadt. Freiligrath, the poet, prosecuted at Dusseldorf for his stirring address of The Dead to the Living—the dead being the victims of the onslaught made upon the Berliners in March, 1848, by the troops—was acquitted by a courageous jury, and lost no time in reaching London. Carl Schurz, doubly compromised by his participation in the Baden insurrection and the deliverance of Kinkel, made his way to Bremen, and crossed the Atlantic, to return five-and-twenty years afterwards as the diplomatic representative of the United States at the Court of free and united Germany. These incidents of the counter-revolution broke up and scattered the forces of Young Germany, and, without being formally dissolved, it ceased to have an organised existence.

CHAPTER XV.

Y O U N G P O L A N D .

THE circumstances in which this Society was formed at Berne, in 1834, have already been related. Among the Polish refugees who formed its nucleus was a young man named Simon Konarski, born of a noble family, and distinguished by his intellectual qualities and attainments while yet a student at the University of Wilna. He probably became at that time a member of the Templar organisation, for, on the outbreak of the revolution, he received a commission in the national army. He was then twenty-two years of age. The courage and address which he displayed led very soon to his promotion to the rank of captain, and he afterwards was awarded the Cross of Honour as a further recognition of his merits and his services to the national cause.

On the extinction of the revolt, in the manner already related, Konarski found means to escape into France, where he remained until the outbreak of the Polish insurrection of 1833. The refugees in Switzerland, France, and England no sooner heard of this movement than they hastened to their native country, to organise the insurgents, and rouse the spirit of revolt throughout Poland. Konarski left Besançon, and made his way, with a few other refugees, to the scene of the insurrection. He found the revolt crushed, and no hope of its resuscitation remaining. His arrival soon became known to the imperial authorities, and his connexions, his antecedents, and his abilities marking him as dangerous, orders were given for his arrest. The Russian officer who first received information of his lurking-place had been a member of the United Slavonians. He proceeded to the house at which Konarski was staying, and warned the owner of the peril in which his friend stood. "I am one of the followers of Sergius Mouravieff," he added; "you understand me; save your friend." The hint was taken; Konarski set out at once for the coast, and, reaching Dantzic in safety, took passage at that port for Antwerp.

The ill-fated expedition in which General Ramorino was engaged, under the direction of Mazzini, was then being organised, and Konarski, with some other Polish refugees, joined it. It has often been made a reproach to these men that they have been ever ready to aid the Revolution, whether in Poland or in Italy, Germany, Hungary, or Dalmatia—that, in the words of their national poet, Casimir Brodzinski, they—

but they are, in truth, more deserving of honour than reproach for not having allowed the sense of their own wrongs to obliterate their sympathies for the oppressed of other nations. Bem, Dembinski, Mieroslowski, Konarski, saw in the Revolution the cause of their own country, moreover, and have felt that every blow struck for the liberties of Italy, Hungary, or Germany hastened the emancipation of Poland.

Konarski proceeded from Antwerp to Geneva, and learned the craft of watchmaking, in order that, in the event of his again entering his native country as a propagandist of revolution, he might deceive the authorities by seeming to make its pursuit his only object. Having thus prepared himself, he visited London in 1835, and developed a plan for organising a new revolt in Poland to the Central Committee of his exiled compatriots. It was a daring scheme, and audacity sometimes succeeds where caution fails; but his countrymen in London regarded it with doubt, and endeavoured to dissuade him from its execution. Konarski would listen to no doubts or fears, however, and, receiving from them at length all the assistance it was in their power to give him, he set out upon his dangerous enterprise.

He proceeded first to Cracow, where he remained some little time; and then travelled through the provinces of Podolia, Volhynia, and Lithuania, communicating in each district that he visited with a few persons whose patriotism and honour would prove his safeguard, arranging with them a system of secret correspondence, and then leaving to them the organisation of their respective localities. By some means, however, information was conveyed to the imperial authorities that a conspiracy was being organised, and efforts were made by the secret police to discover its authors. For some time all these efforts were vain, and the Young Polish organisation, made impenetrable by its secret system, widened and gained strength. It embraced many officers in the imperial army, as well as large numbers of the priests, the landed gentry, and the farmers. The handsome person, genial manners, and fluent speech of Konarski made him a favourite in every society, and women of all classes, ladies of high rank, and the wives and daughters of the peasantry were won over by him in great numbers to aid in the enterprise that, as they fondly hoped, was to liberate their country.

The organisation was progressing favourably when Konarski was arrested, in May, 1838, at Wilna. Refusing to make any disclosures, he was severely knouted on several occasions; and it is even said that, in order to extract the desired revelations from him, his torturers dropped melted sealing-wax on the wounds made by the knout. He more than once fainted under these horrible barbarities, but constantly refused to divulge any particulars of the conspiracy. A Russian officer named Kouravieff—probably another United Slavonian—became interested in his fate, and contrived a plan for his escape from prison; but it was betrayed to the authorities by a fellow-prisoner who had pretended to participate in it, and who probably by that treachery obtained a pardon for himself. Kouravieff was arrested, and carted off to Siberia; and Konarski, after suffering nine months of the most rigorous imprisonment, was hanged at Wilna on the 27th of February, 1839. He died with the fortitude of a martyr, walking with a firm step to the place of execution, and evincing no symptom of agitation, even by the movement of a muscle, as the rope was adjusted about his neck.

Young Poland did not immediately become extinct, but, while there undoubtedly remained, both among the refugees and in their native land, many who still cherished the hope of national independence, the ma-majority seem to have become dispirited by their repeated failures and defeats. Even the stimulus afforded by the French Revolution of 1848 failed to produce any movement in Poland beyond the isolated and abortive effort in which Colonel Oborski participated. Dembinski and Bem preferred to serve the Revolution in Hungary, and Mieroslawski received more encouragement from Young Germany than from Young Poland.

When the counter-revolution of 1849 had made London the refuge of fugitives from all parts of the Continent, and rendered it the centre of the revolutionary system, Kossuth, Mazzini, and Ledru-Rollin were brought together, and became the triumvirate of a propaganda that threatened to erase from the map of Europe the old boundary lines, and draw the frontiers of the future in accordance with the affinities of nations. "The fall of Sebastopol is but the first word of a war the last word of which belongs to the peoples," was the announcement made in 1855 in a manifesto signed by Kossuth, Ledru-Rollin, and Mazzini, and very widely circulated. "Every great movement," they continued, "must have a centre whence the initiation must spring; an arm to raise the flag of the march, a voice to cry aloud, The hour has come! We are that arm, and that voice."

They went on to show how the fear of the Revolution that was inevitable paralysed the action of the Powers opposed to Russia:—

"Revolution troubles their councils, dominates their plans, impedes their movements, and paralyses their military operations. It is the fear of the uprising of the nationalities which causes them to crouch, coward-like, at the feet of Austria, whom, at the bottom of their hearts, they despise ; it is the fear of a Polish insurrection, the dread of seeing the revolutionary flag raised in Podolia and Lithuania, which has shut them out from Odessa and Riga ; it was the fear of raising an echo in Hungary which made them renounce the campaign beyond the Danube, and deliver up the Principalities to the Austrian invasion ; it was the fear of the effect upon the peoples of the smallest territorial change that obliged them to respect the integrity of the Russian Empire, and deprived them of the Swedish alliance ; it is the fear of the Revolution which would meet them on every side, wherever the scent of battle should react on the hostile masses, which forbids them from a general war, and limits them to an isolated point of the Muscovite territory, between the sea and the steppes."

The extent to which this revolutionary triumvirate proposed to alter the map of Europe is indicated in the following extract, which is worthy of more careful study than it has yet received, and is rendered especially interesting at the present time by the events in progress in the frontier lands of the Kaiser and the Sultan :—

" Revolution alone can resolve the vital question of the nationalities, which superficial intelligences continue to misunderstand, but which we know to be the organisation of Europe. It alone can give the baptism of humanity to those races who claim to be associated in the common work, and to whom the sign of their nationality is denied ; it alone can regenerate Italy to a third life, and say to Hungary and Poland, exist ; it alone can unite Spain and Portugal into an Iberian republic, create a young Scandinavia, give a material existence to Illyria, organise Greece, extend Switzerland to the dimensions of an Alpine confederacy, and group in a free fraternity, making them an eastern Switzerland, Servia, Roumania, Bulgaria, and Bosnia.”

The twenty years which have elapsed since this manifesto of Young Europe was sent forth among the peoples have witnessed the liberation and unification of Italy, the recognition of Magyar claims to independence in the new style and title of the Kaiser's dominions, and the construction of a new German Confederation on the broad basis of popular rights and a common Parliament. With the lapse of another twenty years the rest of the programme of Young Europe—much of it already on the cards—may be fulfilled. The union of Spain and Portugal is a scheme not unknown to the statesmen of both countries; the revival of the Union of Calmar has more than once occupied the minds of diplomatists; and the constitution of a Danubian Confederation is one of the most likely events of a period much shorter than has been indicated.

CHAPTER XVI.

YOUNG SWITZERLAND.

AT the time when the idea of Young Europe was realised by Mazzini there was a considerable degree of dissatisfaction existing among the Swiss, especially of the towns, with both the Federal and Cantonal Constitutions, arising from the inequality of the cantonal representation in the Federal Diet and the anomalies of the franchise in the different cantons. There was a strong democratic party aiming at the removal of these inequalities and anomalies, with the head and right hand of which, Jacques Fazy and General Dufour, Mazzini was intimately acquainted. They had been in the secret of the Savoy scheme, and were prepared to support any movement that would strengthen the democratic element in the political institutions of their country.

Young Switzerland was launched into existence for this purpose towards the end of 1834, under the auspices of a committee of Swiss gentlemen, some of whom were members of the Federal Council. It may seem strange that a secret society of native growth and having a domestic object should grow up among a people living under Republican institutions; but it will be seen upon consideration that, unless the less populous cantons consented to a proportionate representation of the more populous, and the privileged minorities in the aristocratic cantons voluntarily surrendered to the unenfranchised majorities, reform was as impracticable by peaceful and constitutional means as the emancipation of the slaves was in the United States.

For the furtherance of the desired reforms, the committee of Young Switzerland contributed funds for the establishment of a journal, which made its appearance in June, 1835, with the title of La Jeune Suisse. It was printed at Bienne, in the canton of Berne, and appeared bi-weekly, in French and German. The compositors were French and German refugees, the director, Professor Weingart, and the editor, Granier, who had formerly edited the Glaneuse, a Republican journal of Lyons, from which city he was a refugee on account of the insurrection of 1832. The German translator was a refugee named Mafy. The affiliation of Young Switzerland to Young Europe, and the known connexion with the latter of Mazzini, was fatal, however, to the journal's existence.

In July, 1836, a French detective, named Conseil, arrived in Berne, where he assiduously cultivated the acquaintance of the refugees in cafés and other places of public resort. To those with whom he succeeded he represented himself as a member of the Families and an accomplice of Alibaud, who had just before attempted to assassinate Louis Philippe. Through some Italian refugees with whom he became acquainted he endeavoured to obtain an introduction to Mazzini, who was too cautious, however, to give an interview to a stranger who declared himself an accomplice of Alibaud to men whom he had met only in cafés. Suspecting Conseil to be a spy, he instructed the Italians with whom the man had become acquainted to accuse him, and endeavour by threats to induce him to confess and give up his papers. In this they succeeded, and even caused Conseil to go to the French Embassy, where, watched by the refugees, he received from Belleval, the secretary of the Duke of Montebello, some money and a list of the refugees.

Having received Conseil's confession, Mazzini communicated with the Swiss police, and the Federal Council ordered a full inquiry to be made, the result of which was that the French Ambassador, who had denounced Conseil as an accomplice of Alibaud, was shown to have been in communication with him, while the spy was exposed by his own confession as an agent of the French police. The Duke of Montebello was furious, and threatened the Swiss Government with the suspension of diplomatic relations, and, under the influence of this threat, the Federal Council arrested successively Mafy, the reader and composers of La Jeune Suisse, some of the contributors, and Professor Weingart. The journal ceased to appear at the end of July, and the edict for the expulsion of Mazzini from Switzerland was issued shortly afterwards, as already related.

The Society made less progress after receiving this check, and, after a time, was transformed into the Association of the Grütli, having the same objects, but unconnected with Young Europe. The new organisation worked quietly for a few years, and attracted no attention until 1844, when, the Cantonal Government of Zurich having appointed a commission to inquire and report concerning the alleged existence of secret and illegal societies in the canton, the Grütli was one of the three associations reported as coming within the category, the trio being completed by Young Germany and the Communists. The Society was at that time very strong, especially in the Protestant cantons, the religious discords of the last three years having increased and extended the desire for constitutional reforms as a means to the diminution of the power and influence of the Romish hierarchy.

While the inquiry was in progress in the canton of Zurich, the religious dissensions which had been agitating Switzerland, and embittering the relations between the Cantonal Governments, culminated in civil war. On the 8th of December, 1844, the members of the Grütli assembled in arms, and marched into the canton of Lucerne, the authorities of which had provoked their wrath by their invitations to the Jesuits. They were repulsed in their attempt to enter the town of Lucerne, however, and the Cantonal Government proceeded to arrest and expel from the canton every man who had taken part in the movement. Intense excitement was created by this measure, no fewer than eleven hundred persons being banished from the canton; and the Society prepared at once to renew the attack with increased numbers and improved organisation. On the 30th of March, 1845, eight hundred men, all armed with rifles, and having with them twelve light guns, attacked Lucerne, under the direction of Colonel Ochsenbein; but the militia of the adjoining cantons having been called into Lucerne to aid in the defence, the assailants were again repulsed, many of them being killed and several hundreds made prisoners.

The Catholic cantons thereupon formed a league for their mutual defence, in defiance of the Constitution, which declared that "no alliances shall be formed by the cantons with each other to the prejudice either of the Confederation generally or of the rights of other cantons." In the following year the whole subject was brought before the Federal Diet, when the expulsion of the Jesuits was resolved upon by eleven votes against nine, and the Catholic League was declared illegal by eleven votes against seven. Nothing was done, however, towards pursuing these resolutions to their natural conclusions, and the influence of the Grütli was exerted in the next general election to increase the strength of the Radical party in the Federal Diet. Geneva, Berne, and St. Gall were gained, and the Diet again declared, by larger majorities, that the Catholic League and the Society of Jesus were illegal associations. After the failure of several attempts to procure the dissolution of the former and the departure of the Jesuits, the Diet resolved to enforce its resolutions; and on the 13th of November, 1847, General Dufour was before Friburg with twenty-five thousand Federal troops and seventy guns. Resistance to such a force was not to be thought of, and the Cantonal Government capitulated.

On the 22nd General Dufour advanced against Lucerne, with his army augmented to sixty thousand men and two hundred guns, against which the Catholic League could array only eighteen thousand men and forty guns. The forces of the League were defeated, and Lucerne surrendered, the immediate consequences being the dissolution of the League and the expulsion of the Jesuits from Switzerland. Monastic establishments, the suppression of which in the canton of Aargau had been the signal for the religious agitation, were suppressed all over the country, and the cantons which had formed the Catholic League were made liable for the expenses of the war.

The French and Austrian Governments, which had vainly attempted to induce the Federal Government not to enforce the resolutions of the Diet, tried the effect of menaces throughout these proceedings; but the revolutions of 1848 obliged them to refrain from intervention, and the Radicals, supported by the Grütli, availed of the opportunity to revise the Constitution. The control of the army, the direction of foreign relations, the settlement of disputes between cantons, and the police and postal arrangements were given to the Federal Diet, and the executive power vested in a council of seven members, elected for three years. The suffrage question was settled by the assimilation of the franchises, and the assignment of one deputy to every twenty thousand of the population. Thus the objects of the Grütli were accomplished, and the Society was thereupon dissolved.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE COMMUNISTS.

THE Communist Societies in Switzerland, which have been mentioned in the preceding chapter, had their nucleus in a little group of Swiss and German workmen at Geneva, who, about 1837, imbibed the views of society and property which had been set forth by Wilhelm Weitling in a remarkable work, entitled "L'Évangile de la Pêcheurs Pauvres." Weitling, an earnest advocate of those ideas of the reconstruction of society which, in various forms, were then engaging the attention of many thoughtful men in France and England, found in the teaching of the Gospel a full exposition of Communism, and commented upon those passages of the New Testament which will bear that construction in language that, being at once forcible and clear, was peculiarly calculated to commend his views to the minds of those among the working classes who, without being trammelled by sacerdotal influences, had not received the religious views of the ultra Rationalists.

Wilhelm Weitling left Germany to avoid military service, which was as incompatible with his principles as it was distasteful to him, and proceeded to Paris, where he found occupation at his trade, that of the tailor. He there imbibed the views of society which found exponents in the works of Cabet, Proudhon, and Constant. Of the three systems founded by those leaders of the French schools of Communism, he embraced the first, which, unlike that of Proudhon, taught that Christianity was Communism, and, unlike that of Constant, inculcated universal charity and fraternity as one of its leading principles.

After much thoughtful study of the social theories propounded in Cabet's "Voyage en Icarie," Proudhon's "La Propriété est Vol," and St. Simon's "Neuve Christianisme," by the light of the New Testament, he conceived the idea of a work which should mingle religion with politics and social science, somewhat after the manner of the great work of St. Simon, but more deeply tinged with ultra democracy. The result was "L'Évangile de la Pêcheurs Pauvres," which created among the workmen of Germany a sensation equal to that which had been produced in France by the celebrated "Paroles d'un Croyant" of Lamennais. Starting with the declaration that faith, hope, and charity are the cardinal points of the Christian system, the author reviewed the acts and words of its Founder, and maintained that Jesus abjured the private family and private property, and taught the abolition of money and heritage, and the communisation of rights, property, labour, and enjoyment.

Proceeding from Paris to Geneva, Weitling began to propagate his views among the workmen of that city, and to found secret societies for their diffusion in other towns of the canton of Vaud. Clubs for the cultivation of vocal music, which exist in most of the Swiss towns, appear to have been, in most instances, the bases of the Communist Associations, which thus preserved the same outward form. Their objects were stated to be the "enfranchisement of all humanity, the abolition of private property, of heritage, of money, of wages, of laws, and of punishments; they desiring an equal partition of works and enjoyments, according to the natural proportions."* By the rules of admission to these societies, candidates were required to be proposed fifteen days before their reception, in order to allow time for making inquiries concerning their character and antecedents. These resulting satisfactorily, the member was introduced by his proposer, and the officers of the Society interrogated them after the manner of the Illuminati and the Carbonari.

According to a MS. seized by the police, on the arrest of Weitling, and appended to the official report of the Zurich Commission of 1844:—"a. They demand of those who present them for what purpose they bring them; b, what end they have in view, and what means they believe efficacious. c. They complete their answers and enlighten them further. They represent to them especially the necessity of silence and of sacrifices, and make them understand that if each introduced his man every month, or even two months, they would, by the end of the year, attain their end without violence, by a simple majority. d. They demand again if they adhere to all these things. e. After which they take their engagement. f. The junction of the Association follows." An address on the principles of the Association was delivered by the chief—another feature common to many of the secret societies, as has already been shown. At each meeting of the Society, the chief asked each member in turn what he had done since their last gathering towards the furtherance of their common object, whether in propagating their principles or in enlisting new members; and, if any one had been remiss, or had proceeded awkwardly, he was suitably admonished and directed.

In a few years the Communist Societies were established at Geneva, Lausanne, La Chaux-de-Fonds, and Zurich, without attracting the attention of the Cantonal authorities; but in 1843 Weitling was arrested at Zurich, on charges of sedition and conspiracy, and a commission was appointed by the Government of the canton to inquire into the character and objects of the various secret societies which were reported to have been introduced from the West. After several months' imprisonment, Weitling was handed over to the authorities of Prussia, his native country, where he was forced to assume the military service from which he had fled. He evaded the greater part of his term of service, however, and made his escape to London.

He was regarded by his followers as a martyr, and the principles which he advocated spread more rapidly than before, not only in Switzerland, but throughout Germany. The greatest strength of the Communists was still in the canton of Vaud, but there was a strong Society at La Chaux-de-Fonds, and smaller Associations in several other towns of Neuchatel. In 1845, however, the Government of that canton instituted an inquiry, in consequence of the report made by the Zurich Commission, and the result was the forced dissolution of all the Communist Societies in Neuchatel, and the arrest of the principal members, followed by their imprisonment and banishment from the canton.

These proceedings having directed the public attention to the Communist organisation and propaganda, a petition was presented to the Diet of the canton of Vaud, signed by eighteen hundred of the clergy, landowners, and others, praying for the dissolution of all German Communist Societies throughout the canton, the banishment of their leaders, the dismissal of the Communist members of the Council of State, and the submission to re-election of all the Communist members of the Grand Council. Only one member of the Diet spoke in support of this petition, and the President proposed an examination of the Communist Societies, and protection for them if they should be found unobjectionable. This was agreed to, and the result of the attention called to the Communists seemed thus far to be favourable to them; but in the end Kuhlmann and Becker, the former belonging to the medical, the latter to the literary profession, and both Germans, were expelled from the canton, and the Society at Lausanne was forcibly dissolved.

While this inquiry was in progress, a Communist Society was discovered at Berne, where the authorities arrested and expelled a German compositor, who was the president of the committee, and dissolved the Association. Dr. Puttmann, a German refugee residing at Zurich, at this time commenced the issue of a Communist journal in German, entitled Rheinische Annalen, and arrangements were made for secretly publishing it in the towns of Baden, Wurtemberg, the Hesses, and the Rhenish districts of Bavaria and Prussia. The first number was seized, however, at Darmstadt, where fifty-five copies were confiscated by the authorities; and Dr. Puttmann was expelled from Zurich by order of the Cantonal Government.

By these measures the progress of the Society was checked, but its ramifications were gradually extended over the whole of Germany, though none of the branches were very strong. The members being, with very few exceptions, working men, the directors of the movement had but small means wherewith to carry on the propaganda, and the repressive measures of the German Governments constituted an additional obstacle. "Our German friends are powerless," an English Communist, acquainted with Weitling, wrote to me in 1847, at which time the movement in Switzerland seemed to have been stamped out. In the following year it became difficult to distinguish the operations of the Communists from those of Young Germany, so much had the latter Society become imbued with the principles that had been enunciated by Weitling; and the counter-revolution scattered the members of both, and broke up their organisation.

At the present time, while the societary theories which have been propounded during the last fifty years are held by large numbers of the working classes, attention is more immediately directed to the formation and extension of trade unions, and the amelioration of the laws affecting the moral and material interests of those classes. As we have seen in England, the realisation of what is immediately practicable is placed before the pursuit of an Utopia, and the possession of the franchise leads the workmen to look to legislation, rather than to pikes and barricades, for the amelioration of their condition.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE FENIANS.

IT will have been remarked that the designations adopted by secret societies of a political and illegal character are, as a rule, void of significance. The Olympians might have been, for aught that was expressed in the name, a society for the cultivation of gymnastic exercises, like the German Turnverein; and the Carbonari, a provident society of Charcoal-burners. The Hetairia was a title no more suggestive of revolutionary designs than that of the Old Friends who meet in the club-rooms of English public-houses; and the Templars, the Families, and the Seasons had a vagueness under which aims as laudable as those of the Druids and the Foresters might have been pursued. But the name adopted by the formidable organisation that had its nucleus and centre among the Irish immigrants in the city of New York combined a traditional significance with an attractive amount of the indispensable element of mystery.

Of the various explanations that have been offered, the most natural seems to be that which derives Fenian from Fionn or Finn MacCoul, a chief famous in Irish legend and tradition, who lived before the Christian era, and has been considered to be identical with the Fingal of Ossian. The Fenians of that somewhat mythical period of Irish history are variously thought to have been Finn's body-guard, a militia, and a military caste; in either character, they were the men of Finn, and there was an undoubted advantage to the progress of modern Fenianism in the association of the movement with the traditionary glories of a period hidden in the mists of antiquity.

The Fenian Association was founded about 1861 by John O'Mahony and Michael Doheny, both of whom were deeply implicated in the Irish conspiracy of 1848, but contrived to elude the vigilance of the authorities, and reach the United States. O'Mahony, after the suppression of the abortive rising initiated by Smith O'Brien, made his escape to France, and afterwards proceeded to New York, where he met Doheny, one of the most able of the leaders who acted under the direction of O'Brien, Meagher, and Mitchel. Among the Irish of all classes then resident in New York there were many who had participated in the abortive conspiracy and insurrection of 1848, or had near relatives who had been implicated in the exciting events of that year. The failure of that movement had impressed the strongest minds amongst them with the conviction that a successful issue could be hoped for in any future rising of the Irish only from a thorough organisation of the masses. To this end it was deemed necessary that their aim should be pursued secretly, by ways and means abundantly suggested by the history of the United Irishmen, whose machinery was ready to their hands.

The constitution and organisation of the Society are set forth as follows in a printed pamphlet which was given to all the members on their enrolment:—

“ 1. The Fenian Brotherhood.—The Fenian Brotherhood is a distinct and independent organisation. It is composed, in the first place, of citizens of the United States of America, of Irish birth and lineage ; and, in the second place, of Irishmen, and of friends of Ireland, living elsewhere on the American Continent, and in the provinces of the British Empire wherever situated. Its head-quarters are, and shall be, within the limits of the United States of America. Its members are bound together by the following general pledge :

“ 2. General Pledge.—I, ———, solemnly pledge my sacred word of honour, as a truthful and honest man, that I will labour with earnest zeal for the liberation of Ireland from the yoke of England, and for the establishment of a free and independent Government on the Irish soil ; that I will implicitly obey the commands of my superior officers in the Fenian Brotherhood ; that I will faithfully discharge the duties of membership as laid down in the constitution and bye-laws thereof ; that I will do my utmost to promote feelings of love, harmony, and kindly forbearance among all Irishmen ; and that I will foster, defend, and propagate the aforesaid Fenian Brotherhood to the utmost of my power.

“ 3. Form of Organisation.—The Fenian Brotherhood shall be subdivided into State organisations, Circles, and Sub-Circles. It shall be directed and governed by a Head Centre, to direct the whole organisation ; State Centres, to direct State organisations ; Centres, to direct Circles ; and Sub-Centres, to direct Sub-Circles. The Head Centre shall be assisted by a Central Council of five ; by a Central Treasurer and Assistant Treasurer ; by a Central Corresponding Secretary and a Central Recording Secretary ; and by such intermediate officers as the Head Centre may from time to time deem necessary for the efficient working of the organisation.

“4. The Head Centre shall be elected annually by a General Congress of representatives of the Fenian Brotherhood, which Congress shall be composed of the State Congress and the Centres, together with elected delegates from the several circles of the organisation—each circle in good standing being entitled to elect one delegate.”

All that was sought by the Fenians is not expressed in the foregoing statement of the Society's objects. There is nothing expressed to separate them from the United Irishmen, from whom, however, they differed widely in their principles and aims. The elder association aimed at the establishment of an Irish Republic by the union of Irishmen of all classes and creeds in a movement directed to that end, in which the clergy and laity, both Catholic and Protestant, worked cordially together, and the aboriginal Celts fraternised with those descendants of British immigrants of whom it used to be said that they were “more Irish than the Irish themselves.” These relations remained unchanged to the time of the collapse of the revolutionary movement of 1848.

The Fenian movement excluded both the clerical and the Anglo-Irish elements, the former on the grounds of the Papal interdiction of secret societies and the hostility of the priests to the movement of 1848, and the latter as incompatible with the popular demand of “Ireland for the Irish.” Its promoters were men of a stern mould, and, having committed themselves to a great enterprise, were resolved not to be baulked by sacerdotal influences or Anglo-Irish sympathies. It was a social as well as a political revolution which they meditated, and "Ireland for the Irish," as interpreted by them, meant the dispossession of every landowner who could not prove his descent from the old Milesian stock, and the partition of his estate among those who could.

The Fenian organisation, like that of the United Irishmen, was military, the unit being a company, and the companies being formed into battalions, regiments, and brigades. The registers showed the strength and efficiency of every company, signs being affixed to each man's name to indicate his degree of preparedness for action; thus V showed that the member against whose name it appeared was provided with a rifle, Λ that he was armed with a sporting gun or a pistol, I that he possessed a pike, and O that he was destitute of a weapon. Initiation was termed enrolment, and was completed by the recruit repeating and signing the pledge of the Association. Pierce Nagle, the informer, in his evidence before the Special Commission of 1865, spoke of an oath taken upon a prayer-book; but the statement is at variance with the printed constitution of the Brotherhood, and it is probable that the oath was administered only when the initiator and the candidate for admission attached peculiar sanctity to that form of undertaking. Only the candidate and the initiator were present when the pledge was administered. There was a code of laws, as among the Carbonari, and a tribunal for their administration, as was shown by a document found in the house of Luby, a member of the executive committee of the Brotherhood in Ireland, when he was arrested. The emblem of the Association was the sun rising behind a ridge of hills.

The central committee had its seat in New York, whence agents went forth in the early years of the Society's existence to form branches in the principal cities of the Northern and Western States. Members were enrolled from all classes of Irishmen, correspondence opened with friends in Ireland, and great exertions made to procure the adhesion of Irish officers in the Federal army, and through them of the Irishmen serving in the regiments or companies which they commanded. The "Head Centre," as the chief of the Association was designated, was John O'Mahony, who seems to have held a good position in New York; and his two most active agents during the early years of the movement were James Stephens and Thomas Clarke Luby, men admirably adapted for the delicate and dangerous work in which they were constantly engaged. Luby was working actively in the United States in the summer of 1863, as an organiser of the movement, among the Irish settlers in the North and West; and Stephens was engaged in the same task in Ireland, where the organisation made rapid progress, chiefly among the artisans and small shopkeepers of Dublin, Cork, Clonmel, and the small towns of Munster.

In the autumn of that year a convention of delegates of the Brotherhood was held at Chicago, when the following address, "To the Brotherhood all over the World," was adopted, and secretly distributed wherever Fenian agents had found an opening for their efforts:—

“Brothers!—We deem it prudent to withhold for the present from publication in the newspapers certain important resolutions having special reference to the revolutionary element in Ireland, which have been submitted to this convention by the Head Centre of the Fenian Brotherhood in America, and unanimously adopted. Printed copies of these resolutions will be placed before the different circles of our organisation in this country, and will also be transmitted, at the earliest fitting opportunity, to our friends at home. In the meantime, we do not wish to separate without addressing to you a few guarded words, such as we can afford to have read by all whom it may concern, respecting the present aspect of our cause. We are solemnly pledged to labour earnestly and continuously for the regeneration of our beloved Ireland. That pledge, with the blessing of Divine Providence, we shall redeem; and when the wished-for hour will have arrived we shall be prepared, with you, to meet the implacable persecutors of our race in battle array, to put an end for ever to the accursed system under which our unhappy people have suffered such cruel tortures, or die like men in the attempt. And in what holier cause has man ever died? How much Irish blood has fallen upon the battlefields of the world? Alas! how much Irish blood has been shed in the service of our country’s oppressor—the plunderer and murderer of her people—the fell enemy of her faith? Over this subject and others connected with it we have pondered long and bitterly. But our resolve is fixed and irrevocable; the foul stigma that attaches to our name must be wiped out. We do not ask, will you be ready? We know you are ready; nine-tenths of the Irish people have at all times been ready in the heart and will to dispute with armed hands the invader's right to enslave and exterminate them. But this is not enough. We must be 'skilled to do,' as well as 'ready to dare.' We are thoroughly convinced of the utter futility of legal and constitutional agitations, Parliamentary 'policies,' and similar delusions. These things have brought more suffering upon our people than would be caused by the most protracted and devastating war. The best of them would but expose the ardent and the brave to the vengeance of cruel despots; and be it remembered that such sacrifices beget no noble aspirations. No enslaved people ever regained their independence, or became formidable to their enslavers, without (in the enslaved sense) pre-organisation. . . . Here we have soldiers armed and trained (thousands of them trained in the tented field, and amid the smoke and thunders of battle), with able and experienced Generals to lead them. Let the cities, and towns, and parishes of Ireland have their brigades, regiments, battalions, and companies of partially disciplined soldiers of liberty silently enrolled. Above all things, let every man be pledged to obey the commands of his superiors, and pledged also never to move without such commands, for obedience to command is the first and most important requisite to the soldier; all the rest is secondary. Thus you will not only be prepared to strike with effect, but all rash attempts at insurrection will be prevented. Without such an organisation as we contemplate, partial uprisings of the people will be sure to occur, leaving no results but the sacrifice of brave men, and, perhaps, the ruin of our cause. When we strike, let us strike home; and are there not strong arms within the enemy's own shores to second the blow? Circumstances are in our favour, such as Providence never vouchsafed before to an enslaved people. We have but to act as becomes brave and reasoning men, and ours shall be the pride and glory of lifting our sorrowing Erin of the streams to her place among the nations. Brothers, rely upon us. We rely upon you.

RICHARD O'DOHERTY, Indiana,	} Vice-Presidents.
DANIEL GRADY, Columbia,
DANIEL CARMODY, Wisconsin,
HENRY O'C. MACARTHY, Illinois,	} Secretaries."
JOHN A. STUART, Indiana,

The progress which the movement had made in Ireland by this time encouraged its promoters to commence the publication of a journal, which was issued in Dublin, under the title of the Irish People, O'Donovan Rossa being the registered proprietor, and Luby the editor. Stephens, who had been appointed Head Centre of the Brotherhood in Ireland, was connected with the journal during the early months of 1864, after which he proceeded to America, having previously delegated his powers to the persons named in the following document:—

“ I hereby empower Thomas Clarke Luby, John O'Leary, and Charles J. Kickham a committee of organisation or executive, with the same supreme control over the home organisation, England, Ireland, and Scotland, that I have exercised myself. I further empower them to appoint a committee of appeal and judgment, the functions of which committee will be made known to every member of them. Trusting to the patriotism and abilities of the executive, I fully endorse their actions beforehand. I call upon every man in our ranks to support and be guided by them in all that concerns the military Brotherhood.

“J. STEPHENS.”

The second annual convention of the Brotherhood was held at Cincinnati, when it was resolved that the next gathering should be held in Ireland. The Association then numbered a quarter of a million of members in America, and Fenian agents were constantly passing between Ireland and the United States. About this time the organisation was introduced into England, where it made rapid progress among the Irish workmen employed in the large towns, and especially in London, Liverpool, Manchester, and Newcastle-on-Tyne. The promoters of the movement were not so cautious in their communications with each other, and with their agents, as the leaders of the later secret societies of Continental Europe have been, and letters were constantly passing between them, any one of which would, if a treasonable correspondence had been suspected, have revealed the plot to the Government.

The letters and documents found in their possession when they were arrested constituted, in fact, a large portion of the evidence of their designs.

One of their agents in England was a man named Archdeacon, to whom the following suggestions were made in 1865, with a view to the creation of a diversion on this side of St. George's Channel:—

“I venture to suggest to you that every encouragement should be given to revive the Chartists. It can be shown to the working men of England, that if Ireland were independent, the Irish workman could get plenty of work and good wages at home. Freedom, therefore, would benefit the working man. The English farmer should be shown that we want to give the English peasant farmer the farm upon which he toils for an idle lord—we want to give him forty acres at least free for ever. We want a Garibaldi for England, a Sarsfield for Ireland, to move upon their enemies, the landlords of both countries, at the same moment. We have an Irish leader in John O'Mahony, backed by fifty thousand veteran Irish soldiers in America, ready for the word. Faithfully yours,

“THOMAS MOONEY.”

The idea of reviving the Chartist agitation renders it probable that the writer was not unacquainted with the relations that existed between the Chartist conspirators and the Irish malcontents in 1848. Among the incidents of that period which are not generally known, were the mission of Macmanus to England for the purpose of establishing such relations, and the narrow escapes from capture which he had while in this country. His presence in London was known to the detectives, one of whom either tracked him to the meeting-place of the Westminster Chartists, at the Assembly Rooms in Dean Street, Soho, or was led to visit that place in the hope of hearing treason or sedition spoken. Being recognised by some person in the room, the detective was pointed out to Macmanus, who, being a tall, powerful man, immediately ejected him from the room, and threw him down the stairs. On leaving London, the emissary of the Irish Republicans was accompanied by a detective to Liverpool, where, however, he contrived to elude the vigilance of his travelling companion in the bustle at the terminus and the crowded neighbourhood of the docks, and crossed over to Ireland. Relations were afterwards maintained between the Irish conspirators and the insurrectionary committee of which Cuffay was chairman by an artist named Dowling, who was tried and convicted at the same time as Cuffay and his associates.

At the time when Mooney suggested to Archdeacon the revival of these relations, the agitation for Parliamentary reform had, in fact, been renewed, and in the following year became strong enough to convince the most enlightened and far-seeing men of all parties that the demand could not longer be resisted with advantage. It was strong enough already to dispense with the aid of plotters for an Irish Republic, and the working men of England evinced no sympathy with the Fenian movement, the aims of which were not in harmony with British tendencies of thought.

Among the Irish workmen, however, the movement made considerable progress during 1865 on both sides of St. George's Channel. Depôts of arms were formed in Dublin and Cork, frequent musters of the initiated were held on fields and wastes, ostensibly for the purpose of playing at football, and drills by Irishmen who had served in the army of the United States took place in unfrequented places on moonlight nights.

Whispers went about from one to another, as these signs of preparation were observed, that the long deferred day of vengeance was near at hand, when an army of Irishmen would come from America commanded by Generals who had won fame and distinction in the suppression of the slave-owner's revolt, and sweep the Saxons into the sea.

But the inevitable spy and informer was already at work. Pierce Nagle, a man employed in the office of the Irish People as a folder, and who had been enrolled as a member of the Fenian Brotherhood at an early period of the movement, was the man. He had been in America during a part of 1864, and had made himself acquainted with the details of the organisation on both sides of the Atlantic. Believing that the plot was nearly ripe for execution, he made disclosures which prompted the assembling of the Irish Privy Council on the 15th of September, 1865, for the purpose of determining upon the measures to be adopted for its frustration, and for the capture and punishment of its authors and promoters. The Council deliberated until a late hour, and night came before warrants were prepared for the arrest of incriminated persons, and instructions flashed along the wires to the magistrates of Clonmel and Cork.

The requisite preparations having been made, a large body of police, armed with pistols, proceeded to the office of the Irish People, and another and smaller party to the house of Luby. The troops were at the same time held in readiness to support the police in the event of a tumult being excited, and rendering such aid necessary for the maintenance of order. No resistance was encountered by either party, however, and the crowd that followed the police who escorted the prisoners arrested on the premises of the Fenian journal did not become dangerous, even when, as happened two or three times on the route, a suspected person was recognised by a detective, and made to take his place with the men already in custody. These comprised O'Donovan Rossa, Shaun O'Cleary and James Murphy, both on the literary staff of the paper; Thomas Ashe and Cornelius O'Mahony, reporters; James O'Connor, book-keeper; and four men employed in the office, of whom Pierce Nagle was one. Murphy protested against his arrest, on the ground of his being a citizen of the State of Massachusetts; but he was marched off with the rest. All the printing materials were seized, and carted away from the office, besides a file of the journal and a mass of letters and manuscripts.

The other party of police watched Luby's house until they saw two men from the office of the Irish People, named Ryan and O'Leary, approach it, and knock at the door; they then arrested both men, and on the door being opened by Luby, entered and arrested him. They then searched the house, and seized a revolver, a bullet-mould, and the document appointing Luby, Kickham, and O'Leary the executive committee of the Brotherhood in Ireland, during the absence of Stephens.

Between three and four o'clock on the following morning nearly twenty persons were arrested in their beds at Cork, and several others at Clonmel, Rathkeale, Killarney, and other places. These were all clerks, artisans, and shopkeepers' assistants. Other arrests followed within a few days. Charles Underwood O'Connell, a captain in the army of the United States, was arrested on landing at Queenstown from the mail steamer in which he had come from New York, and papers found in his possession which showed that he held a confidential position at the head-quarters of the Association; also two letters, signed F. B. Muller, introducing one Daly to Major-General Rosseau and Major Diffisy, "Centre of Wolfe Tone Circle, commanding 35th Indiana Volunteers," as a gentleman "connected with the present movement to restore the Irish nationality," and several military passes granted to the said Daly by officers of the Federal army for the purpose of communication with various regiments during the war.

Stephens was known to have returned to Ireland, and to have been moving from one town to another, enrolling members and disseminating the principles of the Brotherhood, under various names, assumed for the purpose of concealing his movements from the police. Being the Head Centre of the Association on this side of the Atlantic, and second in authority to John O'Mahony, his arrest was a matter of considerable importance to the Government; but for some time he eluded the utmost vigilance of the detectives. Large sums of money had been remitted to him from America, and he had been in communication with Luby and others since their arrest and commitment to Richmond gaol, through an attorney named Nolan; but his aliases and disguises baffled all the detectives, and his arrest was at last effected through information given by an informer.

Fairfield House, a commodious villa at Sandymount, a suburban village overlooking the Bay of Dublin, had been occupied since July by a gentleman who had taken it in the name of Herbert, but who was said by the spy to be no other than the Fenian chief so eagerly sought by the police. Colonel Luke, chief of the constabulary, immediately proceeded to the locality, with thirty policemen, armed with pistols, and surrounded the house between five and six o'clock in the morning. Stephens at first refused to admit them, but ultimately obeyed the summons, and offered no resistance to his arrest. Kickham, and two other gentlemen, named Duffy and Brophy, were seized in their beds, and the house, which was handsomely furnished, subjected to a close search. Four revolvers were seized, and also several criminatory documents and letters, afterwards sworn to be in the handwriting of John O'Mahony, and a considerable sum of money. All the prisoners were well provided with money, one of them having forty-five pounds in gold in his possession, and another a cheque for a much larger amount.

Very little excitement had been caused by these arrests, either in Dublin or Cork, but shortly after the capture of Stephens two detectives who had taken part in them were shot as they were entering the Metropolitan Police-office, both receiving severe wounds. The shots were supposed to have been fired from the window of a house occupied by a tailor named Hopper, then in custody on suspicion of being implicated in the conspiracy. The perpetrator of the outrage could not, however, be discovered. The absence of excitement was probably due to the undoubted fact that both the Fenians and the well-affected portion of the people had the greatest confidence, the former in their numbers and organisation, and the latter in the sufficiency of the measures adopted by the Government for the maintenance of order. Each side, therefore, was prepared to regard all that had happened as comparatively unimportant, and to await the end with calmness.

Profound sensation was created, however, by the discovery, on the morning of the 26th of November, that Stephens had escaped from the prison during the hours of darkness. At four o'clock that morning a man named Byrne, whose duty it was to perambulate the corridors of the prison during the night, awoke the governor with the startling announcement that the door of Stephens's cell was open, and the prisoner gone. On hastening to the cell, the governor found a duplicate key in the lock, and no other clue whatever to the manner in which the escape had been effected. Six other doors had been passed through, and it was evident that the prisoner must have had assistance within the prison. The Government immediately offered a reward of one thousand pounds for his recapture, and three hundred pounds for information that should lead to that much-desired event, with the royal pardon to any person who might have been concerned in the escape. The police immediately searched every house in which it was thought probable that the fugitive might have found a refuge, and scoured the roads leading from Dublin in every direction; but they never succeeded in getting on his track, and the large rewards offered for his apprehension were never claimed.

A strict investigation of the mystery which surrounded his escape was made, but the only evidence that threw any light upon it was the statement of a prisoner whose cell was between those occupied by Stephens and Kickham. A few minutes before the clock struck one this man heard footsteps coming up the stairs; then a key was turned, and immediately afterwards he heard the footsteps of two persons descending the stairs. The inquiry showed habitual laxity and negligence, and the governor was suspended from duty for some time, while Byrne, the watchman, having been found to be connected with the Fenian organisation, was lodged in prison.

The excitement created by the news of Stephens's escape was greatly increased by information given to the authorities by spies, to the effect that the rescue of the prisoners was to be attempted by means of a sudden attack, the plan of which was said to have been organised by Stephens before his escape. So much suspicion had been engendered by that event that the charge of the prison was given to the military and the police, fifty soldiers mounting guard outside the walls, and twenty-five constables patrolling the corridors. No attempt was made, however, and, as the Special Commission for the trial of the prisoners opened on the 27th, the excitement subsided, and the public interest was diverted to the conspiracy which the law officers of the Crown proceeded to expose.

Such of the leaders of the movement as were in custody were first brought to trial, Luby, O'Leary, O'Donovan Rossa, and Kickham being each tried separately, and the rank and file of the movement in batches, the judges proceeding from Dublin to Cork, and then returning to the former city, where they sat far into the following year. The evidence of Nagle and the papers found in their possession were sufficient for the conviction of the accused; and Luby, O'Leary, and Kickham were sentenced to twenty years' penal servitude, O'Donovan Rossa (against whom two previous convictions for political offences were recorded) to penal servitude for life, O'Connell to ten years, and the rest to various periods of imprisonment, ranging from two to five years.

Stephens had, in the meantime, succeeded in reaching the coast of France, and thence proceeded to Paris, where he stayed some time, living in good style, and making no secret of his identity. Other Fenian Centres, both from Ireland and the United States, were in Paris at the same time; and it is probable that the traditions of the United Irishmen were not forgotten in the friendships which they formed with the Frenchmen who cherished the idea of a Republic. Among these was General Cluseret, who had served with some distinction in Italy and Mexico, and was regarded as a possible Hoche. An interview was arranged by their friends between Stephens and Cluseret, and the latter was so deeply impressed by the ability for organisation displayed by Stephens, and by the statements made to him as to the extent of the Fenian system, that he conceived an Irish revolution to be quite feasible. He calculated that the British Government could not, in less than three months from the outbreak of a rebellion in Ireland, bring into the field more than thirty thousand men; and that ten thousand armed insurgents would be able to seize and to hold the ports and communications. He saw that the Fenians were strong in men and money, and he argued that only an able leader was required to insure the success of the movement. "Raise me ten thousand men, armed," said he, "and I will command them."

Stephens returned to New York, where, however, he was repudiated by the Brotherhood as a traitor, it being alleged that he had betrayed the cause to the Government, and by that means had obtained his liberation under the guise of an escape. Without knowing the grounds upon which this conclusion was arrived at, it is difficult to form an impartial judgment; but the charge is not supported by the facts that are known, and, in view of the tendency of the Irish to suspect their leaders of treachery, it may be regarded as unproven. The collapse of the conspiracy, and the disproportion of the results to the expenditure which had been incurred, tended at that time to render the Fenians suspicious and dissatisfied with the conduct of their leaders, and Stephens was not the only one whose reputation was thus clouded.

A committee was appointed to examine the accounts of the Association, and consider the conduct of the executive; and the results were far from satisfactory. "After a careful examination of the affairs of the Brotherhood," says the report, "your committee finds in almost every instance the cause of Ireland made subservient to individual gain; men who were lauded as patriots sought every opportunity to plunder the treasury of the Brotherhood, but legalised their attacks by securing the endorsement of John O'Mahony. . . . In John O'Mahony's integrity the confidence of the Brotherhood was boundless, and the betrayal of that confidence, whether through incapacity or premeditation, is not for us to determine. . . . Never in the history of the Irish people did they repose so much confidence in their leaders; never before were they so basely deceived and treacherously dealt with. In fact, the Moffat Mansion was not only an almshouse for pauper officials and hungry adventurers, but a general telegraph-office for the Canadian authorities and Sir Frederick Bruce, the British Minister at Washington. These paid patriots and professional martyrs, not satisfied with emptying our treasury, connived at posting the English authorities in advance of our movements."

Though the expenditure at head-quarters during the three months preceding the date of the inquiry amounted to one hundred and four thousand dollars, and a sum even larger had been remitted during the same period to Stephens, then in Paris, there remained in the treasury one hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars. It was resolved, therefore, to make a vigorous effort to restore confidence, and, in the belief that the Canadians were disaffected, a raid was made into the Dominion on the 6th of June, 1866, but repulsed by the volunteers. The state of Ireland was so unsatisfactory to the Imperial Government, however, that the military force in that country was largely increased, the constabulary constantly employed in searching for concealed arms, the points thought likely to be attacked strongly guarded, and the coast watched by armed vessels.

Parliament seconded the Government by suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, and many arrests of disaffected persons and large seizures of arms were made in Dublin, Cork, Limerick, and other towns, and also aboard the steamers running between British and

Irish ports. Many Irishmen were arrested on their arrival at Queenstown from America, and arms and treasonable papers found on them. Rumours were in circulation towards the end of the year that the long-projected insurrection would commence on the 24th of December, and that Stephens was coming over to command the insurgent army; but the day passed without any movement taking place, and probably the rumour was circulated only for the purpose of sustaining the popular excitement. Early in the following year, however, some forty or fifty resolute men left New York for the purpose of attempting some bold enterprise, the news of which, if it was successful, was expected to set Ireland in a blaze. Coming to England, they separated into small parties, some going to London, and others to Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, and Glasgow. Cluseret, who had carefully formed the plan of the campaign, came to London, but, finding the centres disunited, and the Fenian body without arms or training, he abandoned the enterprise and returned to Paris, to figure a few years later as Minister of War in the Government of the Commune. Having discovered that Chester Castle was guarded by only half a dozen soldiers, and contained ten thousand rifles and nearly a million of cartridges, besides four thousand swords and a large quantity of powder in casks, an attack upon that place was resolved upon, and arrangements made which promised to be successful. At a meeting at Liverpool, on the 10th of February, it was resolved that the attempt should be made on the following night, and that if the arms and ammunition should be obtained, they should cut the telegraph wires, break up the rails on the lines from Birkenhead, Shrewsbury, and Crewe, make a rush for Holyhead by the only line left open, and seize the mail steamer at the pier.

This promising enterprise was frustrated by the treachery of one of the ex-officers of the army of the United States, who formed an important element of the expedition. On the morning of the 11th this individual waited upon the chief constable at Liverpool, and revealed the plot, which was immediately communicated to the authorities in London and Chester. The magistrates of the latter city assembled in haste, organised a force of special constables, and obtained the aid of a company of infantry from Manchester, and as many of the county constabulary as could be spared. During the day every train from Birkenhead and Crewe brought into the town large numbers of Irish workmen, who strolled about the streets without any apparent purpose, until it was estimated that between fourteen and fifteen hundred had arrived. About six o'clock in the evening scouts sent out by the authorities reported that the Fenians were forming in columns on the roads near the city; but no attack was made, and in the course of the night the unwelcome strangers departed on foot in parties of from ten to twenty.

On the following day sixty-seven men were arrested on a steamer about to leave Dublin for Liverpool, and three rifles were found on the deck, others being supposed to have been thrown overboard on the appearance of the police. On the 13th about eight hundred Fenians surrounded the coastguard station at Cahirciveen, in Kerry, seized the arms, cut the telegraph wires, and shot a mounted constable who was carrying despatches, taking his arms and his horse. They then proceeded to Killarney, but on the following day, troops having been sent there from Cork, they withdrew into the Toomies mountains through the picturesque Gap of Dunloe. Pursued by the troops, they dispersed on the 15th in all directions, most of them making their escape.

Many arrests were made during the next few days, chiefly of persons arriving at Dublin and Queenstown by steamer, and there seems no doubt that the intended surprise of Chester Castle and the outbreak in Kerry were parts of a comprehensive scheme of insurrection, which, owing to the precautions of the Government or the non-appearance of the expected leaders, could not be carried out. It was not abandoned, however, and in the following September two persons who had excited the suspicions of the Manchester police, and who, on being arrested, were found to have loaded revolvers in their pockets, proved, on the Irish police being communicated with, to be Irish officers of the army of the United States, Colonel Kelly and Captain Deasy. While on their way to the City Gaol in the police-van, however, they were rescued by a band of well-dressed men, all armed with new revolvers, who shot dead Sergeant Brett and the horses, wounded the driver and two of the constables forming the escort, and then dispersed. Allen, the man who shot the sergeant, and three more of the band, were run down and captured, and twenty-five others were arrested in the course of the day by the police and troops, who scoured the country around in search of the escaped prisoners, but without success.

Twenty-three of the prisoners were committed for trial, and on the 27th of October a Special Commission was opened at Manchester, resulting in the condemnation of Allen and two others, Larkin and Gould, to the capital penalty, and most of the others to various terms of imprisonment. The executions took place on the 23rd of November, the accused undergoing their sentence with remarkable fortitude, regarding themselves as martyrs of their country's cause, and the acts for which they suffered as ordinary incidents of war. That they were so regarded by the mass of the Irish people was proved by the demonstrations which followed in Manchester, Dublin, and Cork, when between two and three thousand persons in the first-named city, and from fourteen to fifteen thousand in each of the others, all wearing green rosettes, formed processions, with banners emblazoned with the Fenian emblem and inscribed with patriotic mottoes, and bands playing the funeral march in Saul and the well-known Adeste fideles.

Two other Fenian leaders, named Burke and Casey, were shortly afterwards arrested in London, and committed to Clerkenwell gaol, from which a desperate attempt was made to rescue them by blowing up the outer wall. The undertaking failed, but the explosion shattered many of the adjacent houses, killing four persons, and injuring about forty more. Two working men, named Desmond and Allen, and a woman named Justice, who had visited the accused during their detention, were arrested immediately, and three others, named English, Mullany, and O'Keefe, shortly afterwards. The author of the outrage proved, however, to be a man named Barrett, who was subsequently arrested at Glasgow, and removed to London for trial with his subordinates. They were not tried until the following May, when Barrett was condemned to death, and hanged in Newgate, his accomplices (with the exception of Desmond, who was acquitted) being sentenced to various terms of penal servitude. Burke was convicted of complicity in the Fenian conspiracy, and sentenced to fifteen years' penal servitude; but the prosecution of Casey was abandoned.

About a week after the Clerkenwell affair, the Martello tower at Fota, one of the minor defences of the Lee, was surprised on a dark night by a band of armed men, with blackened faces, who were supposed to have landed on the beach. Only two soldiers being in the tower, the marauders carried off the arms and ammunition, and then disappeared in the darkness. On the 31st, a more daring band, but consisting of eight men only, entered a gunsmith's shop in one of the principal streets of Cork in daylight, and carried off sixty revolvers and fifteen hundred cartridges, five of the party holding revolvers at the heads of the gunsmith and his assistants while their companions collected the plunder. No clue to the men concerned in these audacious enterprises was ever obtained by the police.

These exploits were, however, the expiring beams of the Fenian "sun-burst" on this hemisphere. The executive reverted to the original plan of an incursion into Canada, from which country, when revolutionised, a descent could be made, it was thought, upon Ireland more advantageously than from the ports of the United States. Accordingly, on the 25th of May, 1870, two hundred Fenians crossed the frontier near Franklyn, from Vermont, under the command of General O'Neill, and advanced upon Williamstown, where they were met and repulsed by a battalion of Canadian volunteers and a company of regular infantry, commanded by General Lindsay.

The Government of the United States had received early warning of the movement, and General Meade started from Philadelphia on the same day with Federal troops, who confronted the Fenians in their retreat across the border, and compelled them to surrender. Two days later another body of Fenians crossed the frontier near Malone, under the direction of a leader named Gleeson; but they were repulsed as readily as the others, and driven back upon the Federal forces, which surrounded and disarmed them. O'Neill, Gleeson, and others were tried and convicted by an American tribunal, but, being recommended to mercy, the sentences passed upon them were remitted.

The British Government had, in the meantime, granted an amnesty, on the condition of the convicted men undertaking to leave the country, and never return to any part of the United Kingdom. O'Donovan proceeded to New York, and became the chief director of the movement, which was then, however, almost extinct. In the following summer a small body of Fenians made a raid into Manitoba from Minnesota, hoping to revive the revolt of that territory; but, being followed by Federal troops, they surrendered without having fired a shot, or attempted any hostile act. The leaders were arrested, but, there being no evidence of illegal acts committed within the jurisdiction of the United States, they were released. O'Donovan Rossa afterwards retired from the movement, and exchanged the strife of politics for the more solid gains of the wine trade ; and the Fenian organisation, deserted by its ablest leaders, while its funds were exhausted and the rank and file discouraged by failure, subsided into insignificance.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE NIHILISTS.

THE secret Society which, during the last few years, has spread its ramifications over the greater part of Russia on this side of the Ural range is, like the religious societies commonly denominated Quakers, Moravians, Shakers, and Mormons, not known to the outer world by the name which distinguishes it in the lodges of the initiated. The designation applied to its members by M. Turguenief in the novel of "Fathers and Sons," and the appropriateness of which seemed to be shown by the declaration of its principles which was produced on the trial of Cherkésoff and others in 1871, has been generally adopted, however, in the absence of better authenticated information.

It was known, nearly thirty years ago, to those who are in the way of learning the direction of the under-currents of opinion, that the general principles of Socialism, without the distinctive formulas of any of the schools of societary science, had begun to be disseminated among the masses of the Russian population, not yet emancipated from serfdom, but just beginning to think, and to dream of something far beyond that condition. There were a few Russians in the Polish section of the Fraternal Democrats at that time, and, though the Russian police and customs' officers make vigorous searches for prohibited publications among the luggage of persons arriving from foreign countries, their almost universal accessibility to corrupt influences rendered the exclusion of such publications, difficult everywhere, there impracticable.

Nearly twenty years ago, I was informed of an instance in which, while one Englishman, on landing at St. Petersburg, had his Murray confiscated, another was allowed to retain a copy of Paine's works. An organisation for the purpose of introducing into Russia publications prohibited by the censorship is not likely, in such a state of things, to experience much difficulty; and no surprise can be felt, therefore, at the extent to which such publications have of late years been introduced into Russia from London and Geneva, and the circulation of the Kolokol and Vpered in that country, in spite of the interdict of the Government.

The Society known as the Nihilists has been in existence several years. It originated in the spring of 1869 with a gentleman named Netchaief, who had adopted the views of social organisation which have found expression in the works of Proudhon and the Abbé Constant, and found able and earnest fellow-workers in their dissemination in Dolgoff, Orloff, and Ikatscheff, all young men, and members of the most educated section of Muscovite society.

The right of association and the freedom of the press being non-existent in Russia, a secret organisation affords in that country the only means by which novel principles, whether political, religious, or social, can be promulgated; and Netchaief proceeded, therefore, to devise a secret system of propagandism, and to attract to it many of the students of the Petrofsky University.

The principles of the Society have been somewhat hazily set forth by the writers in the Nihilist journal, Vpered (Onward), but they evidently tend to the reconstruction of government and society on the broadest basis. The statement read before the Moscow commission, and which is quoted by Mr. Heckethorn,* bears, however, the impress of concoction by the agents of the secret police. The founders and organisers of secret societies do not declare their object to be the destruction of society and the establishment of a state of political anarchy and social chaos. Such ideas could occur only to the mind of a conservator of the established order of things whose intelligence and judgment were very unequal to his zeal.

Whatever its precise objects were announced to be, the Society obtained numerous affiliations among all classes of the people, and spread its ramifications from Moscow to all the towns of the southern provinces. Addresses "from the United to the Isolated" were widely circulated, and groups of the initiated formed among the students of the colleges, the soldiers of the garrisons, the artisans of the towns, and the peasants of the rural districts. Wherever five members were initiated a circle was formed, and a certain number of such groups formed a section. The direction of the Society was vested in a committee, to which judicial functions were assigned, extending, it is said, even to the infliction of the capital penalty. The whole of the Society's proceedings were conducted with the most profound secrecy. All communications in writing were made in a peculiar cipher; each circle was isolated, so that each member knew only the Nihilists composing the circle to which he belonged; in all the correspondence numbers were substituted for names, and the members of the committee were known only to each other.

There came to be a division of opinion among the leaders, when the organisation had taken root, as to the means by which the end which they had in view should be brought about, Orloff and Ikatscheff being disposed to await the results of the gradual propagation of their ideas among the people, while Netchaief preferred the shorter cut of revolution by physical force. The latter won over his coadjutors to the adoption of his views; but, before the plot was ripe for execution, some of the peculiarities of personal appearance affected by the initiated, such as short hair and short rough coats, attracted the attention of the authorities, and the police found it necessary to make discoveries concerning them. Dolgoff, who held a position in the Society second only to that of Netchaief, was arrested, with Prince Cherkésoff, who had supplied the funds for the agitation, and the son of a military officer named Rippona. Other arrests were made among the students of the Petrofsky University, and a Special Commission was opened at Moscow for the trial of the accused.

All the prisoners were convicted, but, as no acts of treason could be proved against them, sentences were passed that were considered lenient, Prince Cherkésoff being deprived of his civil rights and his privileges as a member of the nobility, and banished to Siberia for five years, while the rest were condemned to various periods of imprisonment, ranging from three weeks to eighteen months.

This investigation and its results caused a temporary lull in the Nihilist agitation, but it was soon resumed, and the movement spread by degrees to the shores of the Baltic. While affiliating to the Society those whom they found prepared to accept its principles, its directors sowed broadcast among the working-classes small publications of a kind specially adapted to their understanding and literary requirements, and thus prepared the ground for farther progress. These publications were not political and metaphysical disquisitions, such as would be addressed to the same classes in England, France, or Germany, but stories of social and political wrong and injustice, which were imported in large numbers, and, bearing the announcement, "Allowed by the Censorship," were, for a long time, sold openly, without attracting the attention of the authorities.

The most popular of these productions, which have been printed at Geneva, relates the troubles of four brothers who have lived from infancy in the midst of a forest, in ignorance of the world beyond its borders. One day they climb a hill, and see villages and cultivated fields; and, conceiving the idea that they would be happier in the society of their fellow-men than in isolation and solitude, they leave the forest to explore the unknown world beyond. Every peasant whom they meet warns them that they will find only poverty and trouble, but they go on, and pursue the quest of social happiness until they are arrested as troublesome fellows, and sent off to Siberia. Throughout the story there are constant attacks on the existing order of things in Russia, the object being to show that the poor are oppressed by the rich, deceived by the priests, and plundered by the tax-gatherer.

Another is an adaptation of the "Histoire d'un Paysan" of MM. Erckmann and Chatrian, replete with eulogia of Robespierre and Marat, denunciations of the rich, and glowing pictures of the moral and material ameliorations which would result from a sweeping revolution, political and social. For readers more educated, the Nihilist propaganda provides well-written narratives of the rebellion of Pougatcheff and the conspiracy of the United Slavonians. For those of all classes who are vocally inclined, there is a collection of songs of a revolutionary and Communistic tendency.

During the autumn of 1874, printed incitements to revolt were extensively circulated throughout the country, and some of them got into the hands of persons for whom they were not intended. About the same time, certain letters and documents came under the notice of M. Zhikhareff, the procurator of the supreme tribunal of Saratov, in the course of judicial proceedings entirely foreign to the Nihilist agitation, and created in the mind of that functionary suspicion of a plot. With the assistance of M. Davidoff, Juge d'Instruction at Tambov, he proceeded to investigate the matter, and soon obtained a clue to a widespread conspiracy, which had for its object the destruction of the existing political and social system, and the reconstruction of government and society on the lines laid down by the Communists.

So deeply impressed are the conservators of order on the Continent with the idea that the International and the Revolution are synonymous terms that MM. Zhikhareff and Davidoff at once jumped to the conclusion that the central committee of the International Association of Workmen were the authors of the plot; but the further prosecution of the inquiry and the arrest of the incriminated persons dispelled that idea, and showed the conspiracy to be the work of the Nihilists. On the first report of M. Zhikhareff to the Government, General Sleskin, the chief of the Moscow gendarmerie, was invested with the powers of a governor-general to make arrests; and he proceeded to exercise them with so much zeal and promptitude, and probably with so little regard to the guilt or innocence of the persons whom he swept from their homes, that several hundreds were arrested in the course of a week, chiefly in the towns of Saratov, Samara, Yaroslav, Tambov, and Penza, and the neighbouring villages and hamlets, and a much larger number placed under the surveillance of the police.

A commission was appointed at Moscow for the further investigation of the affair, and M. Zhikhareff was placed at its head. The persons first arrested were principally artisans and peasants, and it was thought that the workmen's associations for mutual aid might have been instrumental in diffusing revolutionary ideas among the labouring classes. Several of those institutions were in consequence closed; but, as the investigation proceeded, evidence was obtained which implicated many persons of superior education and social position, and among these a large proportion were officials of the judicial and police departments. The more prominent of the accused were Professor Dakhovsky, of the Yaroslav College of Law, and M. Khovanko, president of the general session of the magistrates of Tchernigoff. Besides these, there were among the arrested many superintendents of the rural police and mediators of the peace—officers appointed under the decree for the emancipation of the serfs. Among others who fell under suspicion, and whose houses were searched by the police, but who were not arrested, were the President of the Supreme Tribunal of Kazan and the Procurator of Orenburg, suspicion having been directed against the latter by his having carried some Nihilist manifestoes to that town without, it seems, knowing what they were.

So numerous were the arrests during November that M. Zhikhareff said, early in the following month, in speaking of the labours of the Moscow commission, that so many persons were already in custody that, if the trial of each occupied only one day, the proceedings would last a year. He suggested, therefore, that the accused should be tried in batches. The preliminary investigation was not concluded, however, until the end of June, 1875, when the Minister of Justice made a secret report to the Czar on the affair, and the Minister of Public Instruction issued a circular in reference thereto, announcing that thirty-seven provinces were infected with Nihilism, and directing the teachers of schools to warn their pupils against so dangerous and subversive a system. The publication of this circular created a great sensation, as the facts of the conspiracy had been officially denied by the Government when they first oozed out, and the journals had been forbidden to give publicity to them.

The extension of the Nihilist propaganda to St. Petersburg was unknown to the police when the Moscow commission commenced its labours, though a letter from the former city, written at that time, states that "shortly after General Potapoff succeeded Count Schouvaloff in the direction of the secret police, there was a considerable stir among the Nihilists of the capital, which caused a gentleman here, who is acquainted with many of them, to remark that he should not be surprised to hear of strange events before long. Soon afterwards we heard of the arrests in the south. Here, however, the Nihilists seemed to be as much surprised as anybody else, and, though many of their houses have been searched by the police, no arrests have been made. There is, indeed, a strong and very general disposition here to pooh-pooh the affair, some expressing the opinion that the arrests are due to the desire of General Potapoff to show how clean a new broom can sweep, and others that the secret police have got up the alleged conspiracy with a view to the return to power of Count Schouvaloff."

Though whatever movement of a revolutionary character, if any at all, was designed by the Nihilists was prevented by the number of arrests which had been made and the sudden vigilance and activity of the police, the propaganda went on as before, and arrangements were made for printing a journal in London, the Vpered, and its secret introduction and circulation in Russia. The Nihilists of St. Petersburg, emboldened by impunity, worked with increased activity. Two students of the university, youths of twenty, both sons of priests, named Diakof and Siriakof, made themselves acquainted, under assumed names, with several of the workmen engaged in a factory, and visited them frequently at their lodgings, where they read and commented upon the story of the four brothers, the adapted translation of the "Histoire d'un Paysan," and the narrative of the rebellion of Pougatcheff. Two peasants joined in these readings, and assisted the workmen in circulating the books among their friends.

In the same way, Diakof and Siriakof contrived to introduce the books into the barracks of the Moscow regiment of the Imperial Guards, and especially among the bandsmen. A peasant was employed at the same time in circulating the books among the inhabitants of the villages in the vicinity of the capital. Unfortunately for the propagandists, some of their hearers were in the pay of the secret police, and, while professing great interest in the readings and assisting in the circulation of the forbidden books, they communicated to the authorities what was going on. Diakof and Siriakof were thereupon arrested, together with two other students, named Yeltsof and Viatcheslavof, the two peasants who had assisted in circulating the books among the workmen at the Tcheshher factory, and two privates of the Moscow regiment—all charged with circulating seditious publications and inciting the subjects of the Czar to rebellion.

As there was no apparent connexion between the Nihilist propaganda in St. Petersburg and the conspiracy which formed the subject of the investigation still proceeding at Moscow, it was determined to make the affair of the students the matter of a separate inquiry. No documents were found in the possession of the accused to indicate affiliation to the Nihilist Association, but copies of the books which have been mentioned were seized by the police, and also the Nihilist song-book, and an article of a revolutionary tendency from the Vpered on the distress prevailing in the neighbourhood of Samara.

Diakof stated, at the preliminary investigation, that he had read the books to the workmen for the purpose of explaining to them social and economical theories; and he denied having said, as was alleged by agents of the secret police, that the Czar was the source of all the evils that afflict society, adding to the denial the expression of the opinion that the Czar is often restrained by his counsellors from carrying out his designs for the welfare of the people. He instanced the reforms which Alexander I. wished to introduce, and which were frustrated by the opposition of the nobility. Siriakof said that his desire to become acquainted with the workmen arose from his reflections on the present structure of government and society in Russia, by which the lives of the working classes are rendered almost unendurable. He added that, knowing how sad was the condition of those classes, he thought it his duty to show them that they could emerge from it only through a social revolution.

They were brought to trial in August, when Diakof and Siriakof refused to defend themselves, on the ground that it was impossible to do so with self-respect when three agents of the secret police had given evidence against them. All the accused were convicted, and Diakof and Siriakof were condemned to deprivation of civil rights and hard labour in a Siberian fortress, the former for ten years, the latter for six. The two peasants were condemned to the like penalty for nine years. The third peasant had contrived to elude the vigilance of the police. The two soldiers, who protested that they were ignorant of the illegal character of the books, lost all their advantages of service, and were sentenced to imprisonment for nine and twelve months respectively. Yeltsof and Viatcheslavof were indicted only for having had the forbidden books in their possession, and not reporting the matter to the police; but it was clearly proved that Diakof had taken a parcel into Yeltsof's room during his absence, and asked Viatcheslavof if it could remain there for a time. It was placed in a drawer, and its contents were not known until some time afterwards. Yeltsof was imprisoned, however, for ten days, and Viatcheslavof for six days.

The results of the prosecution of the seven hundred and eighty persons indicted upon the report of the Moscow commission are not yet known; but, whatever they may be, they must be less important than the fact that the Nihilist agitation is still going on, that the journal of the movement continues to be issued from London, and that the Government can suggest no remedy for the evil, apart from the terrors of the law, more efficient than a larger amount of religious and moral teaching, and more careful supervision of the studies and occupations of the young.

The history of the last hundred years might have taught the Czar and his Ministers that the only remedy that can be relied upon to effect the cure of the evil is to be found in representative government, with a free press, freedom of speech, and the right of association.

CHAPTER XX.

THE OMLADINA.

DURING the agitation of the Slavonic population of the principalities and provinces bordering on the lower waters of the Danube by the recent insurrection in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the intelligence flashed to the capitals of Europe by the telegraph on several occasions brought under observation the proceedings of a secret association having its headquarters at Belgrade, and known as the Omladina. The information concerning the organisation of this Society which is as yet available is very scanty; but its object is known to be the establishment of a Republican Pan-Slavonic Confederation. The idea from which it has sprung is not a new one; and, though the Society may have been in existence long before its name began to appear in Reuter's telegrams, it is probable that its founders did not form the primary conception of the idea, so far as the political unity of the Slavonic race is concerned.

We have seen, in the history of the United Slavonians, how the idea upon which the Omladina is based, found expression, half a century ago, among the more advanced minds of Russia; but the political horizon was much more contracted at that time than it must appear at the present day, when Sadowa and

Sedan have done so much for the realisation of the dreams, as they were once deemed, of Young Germany and Young Italy. The vision of the Pan-Sclavonic enthusiast now extends beyond the Carpathians, and embraces the kindred populations of regions subject or tributary to the Sultan and the Kaiser. The late Czar was credited, more than thirty years ago, with the design of uniting all the Sclavonic nations under the hegemony, or at least the protection, of Russia; but, though ambition may have prompted the idea, or the revolt of 1825 have suggested it as a means of taking the wind out of the sails of the revolutionary party, he must soon have been convinced of its impracticability. Suspected alike by the Russian Liberals and the Poles, he could only strive to assimilate, by arbitrary means, the institutions of Poland to those of Russia, and to substitute his own authority, in the Greek Church, for that of the Patriarch of Constantinople. Both schemes tended only to increase his unpopularity. The mantle of Pestel would not sit gracefully on the shoulders of a Romanoff, and the Pan-Sclavonic idea could not be realised.

It need scarcely be said that the views of Nicholas are not those of the Omladina. That Association is of a thoroughly revolutionary character, and menaces alike the Czar, the Kaiser, and the Sultan, as well as the minor potentates of Servia and Montenegro. Its immediate aim is the severance of the link by which Servia is bound to the Porte, and to that end it would aid, to the utmost of its power and influence, any and every insurrection of the Sclavonic subjects of the Sultan, whether in Bosnia, Herzegovina, or Bulgaria. But its ulterior objects are much more extensive, and embrace not only the liberation of all the Slavonic nations from their present rulers, but the formation of a league of Slavonic Republics out of the débris made by war and revolution.

Though the precise date of the origin of the Omladina is unknown, there is little doubt that it was in existence prior to the abortive scheme by which a rising was to have been effected seven or eight years ago in Herzegovina, by the aid of Italian sympathisers, the direction of the revolutionary forces being confided to a Polish General of undoubted capacity and courage. The present insurrection in that region was concerted upon the same plan, and with the same external aid, but with a more careful avoidance of offence to the Austro-Hungarian monarchy. The ranks of the insurgents were largely reinforced by Servians and Montenegrins, and all the influence of the Omladina was exerted to induce both Prince Milan and Prince Nikita to declare war against Turkey, and march their forces into Bosnia and Bulgaria.

Though the head-quarters of the Society are at Belgrade, and its greatest strength is in Servia, it has agents actively at work in the neighbouring provinces of the Ottoman and Austro-Hungarian Empires, as well as in Montenegro and Roumania, and in some of them it has extensive affiliations. Belgrade is well situated for the centre of such an organisation, being separated only by the Danube from the Slavonic dominions of the Kaiser, and having direct communication by road and river with the principal cities of both empires. That the Omladina has there become a great force, whether for good or for evil, has been shown equally by the pressure which it has exerted upon Prince Milan, and by the evident inability or unwillingness of the Servian Government to adopt measures for its suppression. It was doubtful, even when the militia was called out, whether the influence of the Omladina would not prove greater than that of Russia, and war with Turkey be precipitated, contrary to the counsels of Prince Gortschakoff, before the three Emperors were agreed as to the course to be adopted.

The deposition of the Sultan Abdul Aziz, which disarranged the scheme of General Ignatieff for the disruption of the Ottoman Empire, did not affect the views of the Omladina. It was nothing to the directors of that Association that Austria and Germany were glad of an excuse for moving no farther in company with Russia, and that Russia was not prepared to move alone. It is their policy to prevent Servia from becoming a mere agency of Russia for the furtherance of her designs upon Turkey, and to force the hands of both Russia and Austria. They were as urgent as before with Prince Milan, therefore, judging that the first encounter between Servians and Turks, however it resulted, would oblige both Alexander and Francis Joseph, through the sympathies of their Sclavonian subjects, to take the field against the latter, however strenuously they might represent to the Servian Government, while the peace remained unbroken, that they could not protect Servia if she became the aggressor.

Prince Milan would willingly have deferred hostilities until a time came which Prince Gortschakoff might deem more propitious for the realisation of Russian aims ; but he was urged onward by the chiefs of the Omladina, and impressed by them with the idea that the only alternative of war was his deposition, and the proclamation of a Republic. They were not influenced by any of the motives which weighed with Prince Gortschakoff and Count Andrassy, and thought no time could be more propitious for their own aims than the present, when the sympathies of all the Sclavonic nations were aroused in favour of their enterprise, and were evinced in the form of considerable contributions of money, collected by their agents in Russia, Roumania, Transylvania, Sclavonia, Croatia, and Dalmatia.

Before Prince Milan could be induced to declare war, however, an insurrectionary movement was prepared in the south-west districts of Bulgaria, and the adjacent portions of Roumelia, east of the Despoto Dagh. The incitement to revolt is attributed, both by Mr. Baring and by Edib Effendi, to a committee of Bulgarian refugees, said to have been formed at Bucharest in 1862 ; but there can be no doubt that this committee, if not actually a branch of the Omladina, is acting in concert with that Society. Mr. Baring states that the Bucharest committee was constituted " for the purpose of fomenting insurrection in Bulgaria, and of wresting that rich province from the hands of the Turks, to add it to the great South Slavic Empire, which schemers in Moscow and elsewhere have decided shall be built up on the ruins of the Austrian and Ottoman Empires.”* The objects of the Bucharest Committee are, therefore, so far as they go, those of the Omladina; and it is certain that the leaders of the Bulgarian revolt were in communication with the chiefs of that Society just before the rising which provoked such terrible measures of repression on the part of the local Ottoman authorities.

The Bucharest Committee had been five years in existence when the Candiotte insurrection led its members to consider the time opportune for an attempt to excite an outbreak in Bulgaria, and emissaries were sent across the Danube for that purpose. Revolutionary ideas had, however, made very little progress among the Bulgarians, who are a much more stolid race than either the pure Slaves or the Greeks; and had besides little ground for complaint of the manner in which they were governed. The attempt failed, therefore, and, though the Omladinist propaganda was steadily continued on both sides of the Balkans, no movement was made until the revolt in Herzegovina commenced. Great exertions were then made to foment an insurrection in Bulgaria and Roumelia, where considerable discontent had been created by the recent increase of taxation, which the necessities of the Ottoman Government had rendered inevitable. A tumult at Eski-Zaghra, in October, was the sole fruit of those machinations, and it was quelled without difficulty by the local authorities, all who had been concerned in it hastening, as soon as the effervescence had subsided, to betray their neighbours.

Early in March, 1876, arrangements were made, however, for preparing a revolt throughout Bulgaria and Roumelia. Two of the principal actors in this movement were a priest named Hariton and one Hilarion, a native of Rustchuk, but lately a resident at Odessa, who, however, entered Bulgaria with a Servian passport, showing that he had recently been in Belgrade.* These two men organised the insurrection in Bulgaria, while the direction of the movement in Roumelia was entrusted to leaders named Benkowsky, Vankoff, and Betkofski. Their instructions were to organise committees of ten members in the towns, and of four in the villages, a condition being made as regards the latter that the priest and the schoolmaster—men of influence in those little rural communities—should be of the number. When these committees had been formed, they began to collect money for the purpose of providing arms and ammunition, orders for which were sent to Constantinople and Bucharest, but for various reasons were not executed. The conspirators had, therefore, to be content with such old-fashioned and inferior weapons as they could collect in the towns and villages of the two provinces.

On the 22nd of March, one of the emissaries from

* Report of Mr. Schuyler, Secretary of the United States Legation at Constantinople, and Prince Tsereteleff, Second Secretary of the Russian Embassy at Constantinople, on the State of Bulgaria. Printed for private circulation only.

Belgrade and Bucharest was arrested at Sofia, but he did not reveal the plan of the insurrection. On the 31st, a council of the conspirators was held at Panagurishta, where eighty members were present, under the presidency of Benkowsky. It was then resolved that the insurrection should commence on both sides of the Balkans on the 13th of May, when bands of incendiaries were to fire Adrianople, Philippopolis, Bazardjik, Sofia, Tchtiman, and Isladi, and all the villages in and about the defiles of the Balkans, the position of which might be disadvantageous to the insurrection. On seeing these conflagrations, the initiated were to raise the Christian inhabitants in revolt, destroy the railway bridge at Ouzoun Keupni and the rolling stock at Saremburg, take up the rails at other places, cut the telegraph wires, seize the Government stores at Bazardjik, occupy certain important points, such as Avrat Alan, Kalofer, and Tchoukourlou, and commence a general pillage and massacre of the Mahomedans. Copies of these resolutions were sent to all the committees, and special emissaries proceeded at the same time to Sofia and Adrianople.

On the 1st of May, however, one Nenko betrayed the plot to the Kaimakam of Bazardjik, who immediately communicated the discovery to Aziz Pacha, the Mutessarif (or governor) of Philippopolis. Officers were promptly despatched to the former town to arrest the persons implicated in the conspiracy, and Aziz Pacha proceeded there immediately afterwards, with a small escort of cavalry. Benkowsky had, in the meantime, discovered Nenko's treachery, and convened a meeting at Metzka, at which it was resolved to precipitate the outbreak, and raise the country without loss of time. In obedience to his orders, the initiated raised the Christians of Panagurishta and Avrat Alan, who killed all the Mahomedans they could surprise, and constructed some rough barricades and entrenchments. Small bands of insurgents visited Yenikeui and other villages, marching with a green flag before them, on which a gold cross was emblazoned; and induced the inhabitants to join them by stating that the Mahomedans had projected a general massacre of the Christians, and that a Russian army had crossed the Danube. The village of Zindjirli was burned, after being abandoned by the inhabitants, and also the village of Strelidja, partially occupied by Mahomedans, and four small Turkish villages forming what was known as the Yourouk Mahallin. A large number of men from the neighbouring villages hastened to Avrat Alan and Panagurishta, and some slight preparations for resistance to Ottoman rule were made at Bratzegovo, Klissoura, and Peroustitza.

Benkowsky hurried from Metzka to Bellova, where he incited a rising by announcing that the revolt was general, and that twelve thousand insurgents were marching to attack Bazardjik. There were only six soldiers in the place, and the insurgents massacred them, burned the railway station, and cut the telegraph wires. This or another body of the insurgents also burned the Mahomedan village of Palenka, cut the telegraph wires at Vetren, a village on the high road from Bazardjik to Sofia, and fired on the post-courier and some soldiers who were escorting the harem of Hassan Pacha. Aziz Pacha had in the meantime left Bazardjik for Panagurishta, accompanied by some Mahomedan notables, and about a hundred soldiers. This movement created some alarm, and when, later in the day, a report was spread that the Mutessarif was surrounded by the insurgents, a general panic ensued; the shops were closed, the villagers who had brought into the town the produce of their fields and gardens fled in haste, leaving their carts and goods in the market-place, and Mahomedan women ran about the streets in the wildest excitement. The Moslem inhabitants immediately flew to arms, and the position of the Christians became critical.

Aziz Pacha had not been surrounded, however, but deemed it advisable to return to Bazardjik, owing to the state of the country, in order to concert the measures which the gravity of the situation seemed to require.* The arrival of four hundred regular troops by railway calmed the fears of the Mahomedans, and allayed the excitement; and Aziz Pacha then returned to Philippopolis. There also great excitement had been produced, both among Mahomedans and Christians; and it was increased by the bursting out of conflagrations in several parts of the town at the same time, and the approach of a body of the insurgents, who endeavoured to spike the signal-gun mounted on a neighbouring eminence. The guard had been doubled, however, and they were beaten off. Warned by the signal-gun, some hastily-organised bands of volunteers mustered for the defence of the town, and the flames were extinguished before much damage had been done. The Vali of Adrianople, on being telegraphed to by some Mahomedan notables, replied that they must arm and defend themselves as well as they could, and sent Raschid Pacha to command them. For several days a state of anarchy and terror prevailed, and the most shocking outrages were committed by the barbarous irregulars, to whom the suppression of the insurrection was unavoidably committed until regular troops arrived in the disturbed districts.

On the 7th, Hassan Pacha marched into Vetren from Nisch, made numerous arrests, and burned nearly a third of the village. He then proceeded through Bazardjik to Bratzegovo, where desultory skirmishing had been going on for several days between the insurgents and the irregulars (Bashi-Bazouks), and about fifty houses had been burned. On the appearance of the regular troops, the insurgents laid down their arms, and about fifty of them were marched off to prison. Achmet Agha, of Dorpat, had in the meantime collected four or five hundred Bashi-Bazouks, and marched with them against Batak, where the insurgents had seized and murdered several travelling merchants of the Mahomedan faith, and also seized the son of a Turkish official, who had entered the village to inquire into the reports of those crimes, and who only escaped death by the interposition of a Bulgarian notable. The insurgents had entrenched themselves, and received the troops with a warm though irregular fire of musketry; but the latter, after exchanging a few volleys, carried the village by storm, driving the rebels before them, and cutting down without mercy all whom they could reach. Many of the latter established themselves in a church, whence they kept up a galling fire upon the assailants. The latter then set fire to some wooden buildings surrounding the church, from which the insurgents were at length forced to sally out, and fight for their lives. Many were slain on both sides; but the assailants gained the mastery, and those of the insurgents who were not killed or severely wounded fled from the village, which was then committed to the flames.

At Boyadjik-keui the disaffected peasants had raised entrenchments, and refused to allow Mahomedans to pass through the village; and, on Hachem Effendi, the Kaimakam of Zamboli, proceeding thither to investigate the state of affairs, accompanied by a few soldiers, he was refused admission. The commander of the military division of Islimie thereupon marched against the place with a battalion of regulars and some volunteers. When he arrived before the village some old men came out to parley with him, apparently for the purpose of gaining time for the insurgents, for they retired precipitately from the conference, and a heavy fire was immediately opened upon the troops. The order to attack was then given, and a sanguinary conflict ensued, which ended with the defeat and flight of the insurgents, who left between seventy and eighty of their number among the slain, the village in flames, and their cattle in the possession of the victors.

Hafiz Pacha, who commanded the regulars who first reached Bazardjik, marched upon Panagurishta on receiving reinforcements from Constantinople, and reduced to obedience the insurgents who had assembled at that place without the smallest difficulty. On the following day, the 13th, Raschid Pacha reached Peroustitza from Philippopolis, and, dispersing the insurgents with a single volley, entered the village, and burnt it to the ground. Some skirmishes ensued between the troops and the bands of insurgents driven from the villages, and then the insurrection was at an end. In one of these, near Orhanie, Betkofski was slain, and a copy of the resolutions of the revolutionary council was found upon his body, which fell into the hands of the troops.

In Bulgaria the rising was insignificant, even as compared with the movement in Roumelia. The peasants did not rise so promptly as in the villages south of the Balkans, and their revolt was suppressed with even less difficulty. A small band assembled near Tirnovo under the leadership of the ex-priest Hariton ; but, on the approach of some regular troops and Mahomedan volunteers, fled into the mountains, and took refuge in the monastery of St. Michael, near Drenova. There they were surrounded on the 11th of May, and on the arrival of Fazly Pacha from Shumla with two guns the monastery was cannonaded. Some of the insurgents escaped under cover of the night, aided by a thick fall of snow ; and the remainder marched out at daybreak without their arms, and with a white flag before them. They were immediately surrounded by the assailants, who massacred the whole of them, and afterwards plundered the monastery, which was also partially destroyed by fire.

Another band, consisting of about thirty men, assembled near Gatrova, and was led by Tzanko Dustaban, an educated inhabitant of the town. After attacking unsuccessfully a military post on the road to Shipka these men proceeded to Novo Selo, but on the approach of a company of Bashi-Bazouks, led by Deli Nedjib, the Kaimakam of Plevov, they fled into the mountains, accompanied by most of the villagers. On the 21st Novo Selo was pillaged and burned by the Bashi-Bazouks, who afterwards pursued the insurgents into the mountains, massacred some hundreds of them, including many women and children, and dispersed the rest. Hilarion had in the meantime formed a band near Slivno, but was surrounded in the mountains on the 19th by three hundred regulars and some Bashi-Bazouks, who had been raised in the neighbouring villages. After a short resistance the insurgents surrendered, and thirty-five of them were marched with their arms bound into Slivno, where several were subsequently decapitated. Terrible excesses and barbarities are said to have been committed in this district, and also in some of the Roumelian villages, after the revolt had been suppressed, according to the precedents established in similar cases by the Russians in Poland and the Austrian and Pontifical troops in Italy.

In Herzegovina, the Omladina had succeeded in awakening the spirit of revolt among only a very few of the people, and the insurrection had been kept alive by the flocking to the disturbed districts of Omladinists from Servia, Montenegro, and Dalmatia, aided by Italian and Greek sympathisers. It merely maintained a languishing existence in the southern districts, and even the Montenegrin invasion did not spread the flame. In another quarter, the Omladina received a blow in the arrest, by the Austro-Hungarian authorities, of M. Miletich, a member of the Diet, and the chief of the Hungarian section of the Society, who, with several other Austro-Hungarian Slaves, also members of that organisation, were apprehended at Neusatz, a town in Hungary, on the 5th of July. At the house of M. Miletich several letters were found, implicating other persons, and showing that there had been a correspondence with M. Ristics, the Prime Minister of Servia, and an offer of men and money from the Austro-Hungarian Omladinists for the impending struggle with the Porte.

The end of that struggle has not arrived, and may be long in coming. General Ignatieff and the Omladina have alike failed to arouse the Slavonic subjects of the Sultan to more than partial efforts; and even the Servians, though led by a Russian general of experience and skill, were speedily compelled to retire before their better disciplined and more numerous foes. Foreign aid has been withheld from them, owing to the impossibility of reconciling the policy of Count Andrassy with that of Prince Gortschakoff; while the views held both at Vienna and St. Petersburg are as hostile to the project enunciated by Mr. Gladstone as are those entertained at Constantinople. The Russian Government would not like to see the realisation of the dream of Peter the Great frustrated by a Slavonic Confederation south of the Danube ; and the Austro-Hungarian Government, whether directed by a German or a Magyar, will not sanction political arrangements which would be an example and an incentive to the millions of Slaves within their own frontiers.

There can be no doubt, however, that the dream of a Slavonic Confederation will some day be realised, and that day may not be far distant ; though the precise manner in which the new political edifice is likely to be raised is not foreshadowed in the pamphlet of Mr. Gladstone, or the letters of Mr. Grant Duff. No one acquainted with the under-currents of foreign politics, and with the policy which Prince Bismarck has been steadily pursuing since he saved Germany from revolution, by binding up the aims of the people with the fortunes of the House of Hohenzollern, can fail to perceive, firstly, that the Eastern question cannot receive its final solution without the disruption of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, as well as the extinction of Ottoman rule in Europe ; and secondly, that it is from Berlin, and not from St. Petersburg, that the signal will be given for the crowning crash. The Austrians are now the only Germans not included within the new German Empire ; and German unity will not be complete until the south-eastern frontier is extended to the Carnic Alps and the border line of Hungary. It may be confidently anticipated, therefore, that when the Eastern question is ripe for solution, and Austria is brought face to face with the imminent formation of a Slavonic Confederation, the Court and Cabinet of Vienna will have to choose between the loss of the south-eastern provinces of the Empire, and the incorporation of the adjoining provinces of Turkey within its limits. It will be truly a choice of evils ; but it will have to be made, the interests of both Germany and Russia requiring them to put the strongest pressure upon Austria, to prevent her from remaining neutral.

The annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina will be the alternative recommended at Berlin and St. Petersburg ; the interests of Germany demanding the incorporation of Austria proper with the German Empire, and those of Russia being opposed to the formation of a Slavonic Confederation. As the rejection of this course would involve a revolt of her Slavonic population, aided, openly or secretly, by Germany and Russia, she may be expected to accept what seems inevitable, and drift eastward with the hope, perhaps, of recovering on the Lower Danube the prestige and influence which she has lost in Germany since Sadowa was fought, and the Treaty of Prague signed. The change will produce discontent among the German and Magyar subjects of the Kaiser ; there will be agitation among the former for incorporation with their Fatherland ; and Prince Bismarck, or his successor, will demand the cession of Austria proper as compensation for the extension of the Kaiser's dominion south-eastward. The cession will be made sooner or later, and the separation of Hungary will follow, leaving the Slaves to shape their own destiny, free from the influence alike of Vienna and of Pesth; while the dreaded domination of Russia will cease with a solution which will reduce her to isolation. The Slavonic Confederation may not be founded upon the lines laid down by the Omladina, any more than the Germany and Italy of to-day realise the aims of Young Germany and Young Italy; but its formation may be as confidently anticipated as the unity of those countries might have been thirty or forty years ago.
